On Wednesday morning Mr. John W. Pender, of Broad-street, was elected a Common Councilman for the Ward of Broad-street, in the room of Sir Thomas Abraham, deceased.

The first statue to the memory of John Hunter, the greatest physiologist England has produced, to whom and the council of the Royal College of Surgeons the medical profession is indebted for the museum, which is collection in Europe, has just been placed in the Hunterian Museum. It is executed in marble, and is from the studio of Henry Pegram, R.A.

A mule and donkey show was opened at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, on Monday, and attracted numerous visitors. The prize for foreign asses was carried off by a splendid animal exhibited by the Prince of Wales. The show of the British animals proves that all the mules and donkeys in the country are not ill treated.

At a meeting of the Metropolitan Board of Works, yesterday week, Mr. Budgett, the engineer, read a detailed report on the present state of the sewage works, from which it appeared that fair progress had been made. Some conversation took place on the report of the Thames Embankment, and it was stated that the progress of the work is somewhat impeded from the want of proper material to make the bank.

The pictures selected by the prizeholders of the London Art Union for the year 1864 were exhibited at the Gallery, at the Gallery, Suffolk-street, Pall-mall. The total number of works on view is 1,428, and 428 are oil paintings and water-colour drawings, the remaining eight being bronzes, vases, bas-reliefs in ivory, and engravings and lithographs.

The anniversary meeting of the Fellows of the Royal Botanic Society was held on Wednesday at the Botanic Gardens, in the Inner Circle, Regent's Park. Professor Bentley presided over the meeting. Mr. Reverly, the secretary, read the report, which stated that the present number of Fellows was 3,350, of whom 117 had been elected during the past year. The receipts from all sources had been satisfactory, and those from the exhibitions of flowers resulted successfully. As many as 20,972 tickets had been sold for the exhibitions. The income had been £10,781, and the expenditure £9039. The number of students was 841. The lectures had been well attended.

The first packet of Kent hops, growth 1864, consigned by Mr. Alfred White, of Nettlestead and Yalding, to Messrs. Wigg, Wells, and Co., Borough, was on Tuesday sold, at 67 per cwt., to Messrs. E. Bewley and Co., Leeds, on behalf of Messrs. Jones and Co., pale-ale brewers, Alliton Brewery, Leeds. The quality is very superior to the general run of first packets.—The second packet of hops of this year's growth arrived at market early on Wednesday morning, consigned by the grower, Mr. Thomas Weichman, jun., of Goudhurst, to Messrs. J. T. and H. Smithson, Borough, where it was sold to Messrs. Baker, White, and Morgan, Borough, at 67 per cwt. The quality is excellent for such early hops.

Last week the births of 1906 children—974 boys and 932 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1854-63 the average number was 1,852. The deaths registered in London were 1,099 in the last week of July, and the same rate of mortality continued to prevail in the week which ended on the 6th inst., when the number was 1,096. The average number of deaths for the thirty-first week of the ten years 1854-63 is 1,107. The excess of deaths over births in the week is the result of the increase in the summer diarrhœa, which carried off 286 persons, of whom 209 were infants under a year old. Besides these, 28 deaths were caused by cholera. The deaths from measles rose to 102.

The subsidiary names are to be abolished and the houses re-numbered in the following thoroughfares:—Abbey-street, Bermondsey; Seymour-road, Euston-square; Victoria-road, Kentish Town; and Mornington-crescent, in the parish of St. George-in-the-East, Cornwall-street, Spencer-street, Munro-street, Trafalgar-street, and Jubilee-street, to be called Shernden-street.

A general meeting of the London and Middlesex Archæological Society was held on Tuesday at Hayes, Hartington, Cranford, and Hounslow, for which places visits were paid by a goodly number of members and their friends. The company first inspected Hayes Church, where the Rev. Mr. Hall, the rector, explained out by Mr. Charles Alfred White, F.S.A., did the same for Hartington, to which the archæologists next bent their steps. At Cranford, Hounslow, and Isleworth the celebrated Mr. Pulley, they met with a most cordial welcome from the worthy Incumbent, the Rev. Mr. Hall, who read a paper on Cranford in History, where Mr. Hall, F.S.A., and Mr. Alfred Heales, F.S.A., read descriptions of this church and the interesting monuments in it. The Rev. Henry Addington, followed with an elaborate history and description of Moor Hall, at Harefield, a grange of the English Benedictines of St. John of Jerusalem, one of the most interesting places in Middlesex, and all but unknown even to professed archæologists. The visitors then proceeded to the new and handsome schoolroom, which had been kindly lent for the occasion by the Rev. R. Spooner, the Vicar, and, after partaking of refreshments, which were provided due to the good things provided, Mr. Tyson, a neighbouring landowner, was in the chair, and read a paper on Isleworth Manor, and the privileges of those who had taken a part in the business of the meeting, closed the proceedings of a very full and interesting day.

Mr. Alfred Mellon's Concerts, which were resumed for the present term on Saturday afternoon last at St. James's Hall, were the grand promenade into which Covent Garden has been converted for the purpose we remember, and the band, also, is the same, with the exception of the orchestra of the Royal Italian Opera and the Musical Society of London, which with the addition of Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, Mr. Lazarus, and violoncellist, and displayed her wonderful powers of voice. Of Mr. Carrodus, who has also been retained, we have had certain evenings to speak in the highest terms the first master, and on other occasions unaccompanied airs are to be expected from Mr. Lazarus, Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Howell, and other masters of musical taste and intelligence.

The Commissioners recently appointed on the Wall Paintings in the Westminster Palace have issued their report. They have to state that, in consideration of the sum of £3,000 paid by the Earl of Dudley for Mr. Herbert's picture of "Moses Bringing Down the Second Tables of the Law," and of the sum of £1,000 paid by the Corporation of London for Mr. Dyce's picture of "Religious Devotion," whereby the artist had to cancel a quantity of his work, they had retired the Commissioners' debt to the amount of £4,000, and that further the £3000 he has already received, should be paid to him on account of that picture. They also report that they have accepted the remaining eight works should be cancelled, and that if those works are to be completed at the public charge, they should be done by competition. Mr. Herbert's great picture, they in nowise urge (!)—it ought to be under a room better adapted to show the artist's work. Mr. Macculloch, the Commissioners recognise the painter's great diligence and energy, and the fact that he has already had no larger employment. They have received from private commissions, and therefore recommend that he should be paid £18,000 instead of £12,000 as agreed to should receive for the two Arthurian frescoes pictures in the Royal Gallery."—The Meeting of Wellington and Blucher" and "The Duke of Wellington Entering Brussels." The Commissioners think Maclise's contract for the remaining pictures should be cancelled, and it expressed their opinion that the commissions should be given to Commissioners that Messrs. Cope and Ward shall be requested to complete their several series of pictures in the same manner, and that each should receive £3,000 for the present satisfaction to be present, by your wish, at the inauguration of the statue which you have raised to the memory of my lamented father. It is an occasion on which I feel a sincere gratification at thus being called on to assist in paying honour to a distinguished parent, as well as to express my thanks for the generosity and liberality of the licensed victuallers in providing this asylum for the reception and comforts of their less fortunate brethren. Appreciating your charitable exertions and their object, the Prince Consort took a deep interest in the welfare of this institution, and was pleased to accept of which he held the foundation-stone of additional wings to the building. In the Prince Consort I have lost a father, and it is a consolation to me to be thought to have inherited his feelings in your behalf. I thank you sincerely for the kind manner you have received my brother and his consort, the Prince of Wales, and my sister, the Princess Alice, and myself. This meeting here, with your loyal cheers, the cheers of the Queen and the "Hallelujah" chorus—"Hallelujah" for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." In the name of all the world I proclaim the reign of God and of His Christ, and He shall reign for ever and ever "King of Kings and Lord of Lords." Mr. Sims Reeves, who was received with loud cheers the whole company remained standing, and on the conclusion the procession was performed, and the Royal Highness withdrew amidst cheers.

Action can be commenced under the Bills of Exchange Act, and judgment obtained, unless leave is given by a judge. The judges sitting in the Queen's Bench will only sit two days a week; and as Mr. Justice Shee is the last-appointed judge, he is entitled to the privilege of not sitting. Last Saturday an inquest was held in the Westminster County Court, by Mr. M'Lean, against a shopkeeper in High Holborn, named Hall, to recover possession of the premises, which were held by the defendant in exchange for selling a print of the "Prisoner's Widow." The damages were laid at £41. The plaintiff stated that he had served the defendant with a writ for the sale of this picture, and £150 to the artist for the copyright, making £850. The print had since been withdrawn, and the pixalated truths had been carried on to such an extent as to do incalculable injury to the publishers, who spent their best energies to secure. The Judge ordered that the plaintiff be rendered himself liable under the Act, and accordingly made an order for the amount of damages claimed, with the proportionate costs of the action.

The case of Mr. Stiff, the former proprietor and originator of the London Scottish Regimental Association, before the Bankruptcy Court, commenced on Monday. Mr. Stiff had made application that the official assignee of his property should be discharged, and that he should receive his certificate to do the best advantage. The Commissioner refused the application.

The Coroner's Court, Middlesex Hospital, on Monday was resumed on Monday, and the effect of the evidence given was to strengthen the case against Millier. The case was again adjourned.

THE GALAGO IN THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY'S GARDENS, REGENT'S PARK.

The little animal represented by our Engraving is the only living specimen in this country of the Galagos found in various parts of South Africa. It was brought to England about three weeks ago by Dr. Wagstaffe, the physician who accompanied Dr. Livingstone in his last sojourn on the Zambesi River. A stuffed specimen, belonging to Mr. J. E. Gray, has been in the British Museum, and in the Zoological Society, and is described in page 231 of the volume of their Proceedings for 1863, by Mr. A. Bartlett, the superintendent of the Society's Gardens. The Galago is a lively animal, including the tail, which has a length of 16in. Its colour is a dull yellowish grey; but the eyes are very large and full, and quick and black. It has the power of turning its ears back and folding them up, which in their usual position when the animal is at rest; but when it moves about in search of food the ears are opened and spread out. Its disposition is very gentle; it sleeps much during the day, and feeds upon fruit and bread and milk, but likes sweet things, and particularly bananas. The society's collection has just received a valuable addition in both children and other rare birds which Mr. Thompson, the land keeper, has brought from Assam. The young mooruks which were hatched and reared by their male parent in the manner shown by an Engraving lately published in this Journal are both dead, having fallen victims to the late change in the weather.

"CITY OF CHIUSI, ETRURIA."

The fine drawing by Mr. T. M. Richardson, engraved on page 164, is distinguished by the very skilful, picturesque, and effective qualities which characterise all the works of this deservedly popular painter. The artistic merits of this drawing is, however, not its only claim upon attention. To the archæologist and antiquary, to the historian and the ethnologist, as well as to the artist, the scene represented is one of the most interesting anywhere to be found. Away from the high road between Rome and Siena, and therefore seldom visited by the modern traveller, the city of Chiusi stands on the site of the ancient Clusium, one of the twelve cities of the Etrurian League, once the most important political capital in Etruria, and famous in history for—among many other circumstances—the King Porsena, whose conquest of Rome (expressly stated by Tacitus and confirmed by other writers) the vanity of the Romans tried to conceal by their stories of the superhuman prowess of the single-handed Roman who encountered him on the Janiculum; of his keeping the whole Etruscan army at bay while his comrades broke down the bridge behind him; and of the equally superhuman fortitude of C. Mucius, the would-be assassin of Porsena, who burnt off his right hand for the Etruscan monarch, to pretended to have thrust his hand into the fire upon the altar, and there let it burn. Clusium is also memorable for the marvellous ornaments in the shape of Plinth and Vases of the mausoleum and labyrinth of Porsena. The town is now literally undermined by subterranean passages of which although some of them were possibly connected with the sewerage of the ancient city, there can be no doubt that the greater part of which are still a mystery. Four principal tunnels, which have been explored, and which are celebrated throughout Europe for their contents, have each been claimed as the work of the emperors of Rome; nevertheless, it is now generally believed that the tomb of Porsena has yet to be discovered. The sepulchral monuments, however, the vases, and the treasure so profusely scattered about, with their paintings, or bas-reliefs, the bronzes, fossilum, or bones; the mirrors, or burnished mirrors; and the re-mains of jewellery which have been discovered in the numerous tombs in the neighbourhood of Chiusi, form a most important contribution to our knowledge of that wonderful people, the Etrurians, and, more materially to supply the connecting links between the Egyptians, the Greeks, and the Romans. The paintings, for instance, indeed, unique as representations of national manners. From Chiusi being in Tuscan territory, the principal objects of those tombs have not found their way into the British Museum or the Etrurian antiquities of the Museum formed by Pope Gregory XVI., or elsewhere, but are preserved for the most part in the local museum. The most important part of the Etruscan remains preserved in these museums are examples of a description of pottery peculiar to the country and known as the coarse, black, vulgared ware, of rude archaic form, decorated with caricatured grotesque figures of animals and monsters, the style and execution decidedly a drawn and manufactured one anterior that influence of Greek art which at a later period so extensively prevailed in Etruria. It is to be hoped by our Engraving that Chiusi is most picturesquely situated on an acropolis-like eminences (the road to which is a feat in itself for every ascent), and that it is reached by a beautiful lake, to which the city gives its name of Lago di Chiusi. The much larger lake of Trasimeno is situated at some little distance between Chiusi, and Perugia, and is the neighbourhood of Cortona, celebrated throughout Italy for its wines—"d'ogni vino il Re"—and for the Fiera, or Country of Perugia, dear to all admirers of the early works of Raphael and the saintly Umbrian school.

"THE ESCAPE."

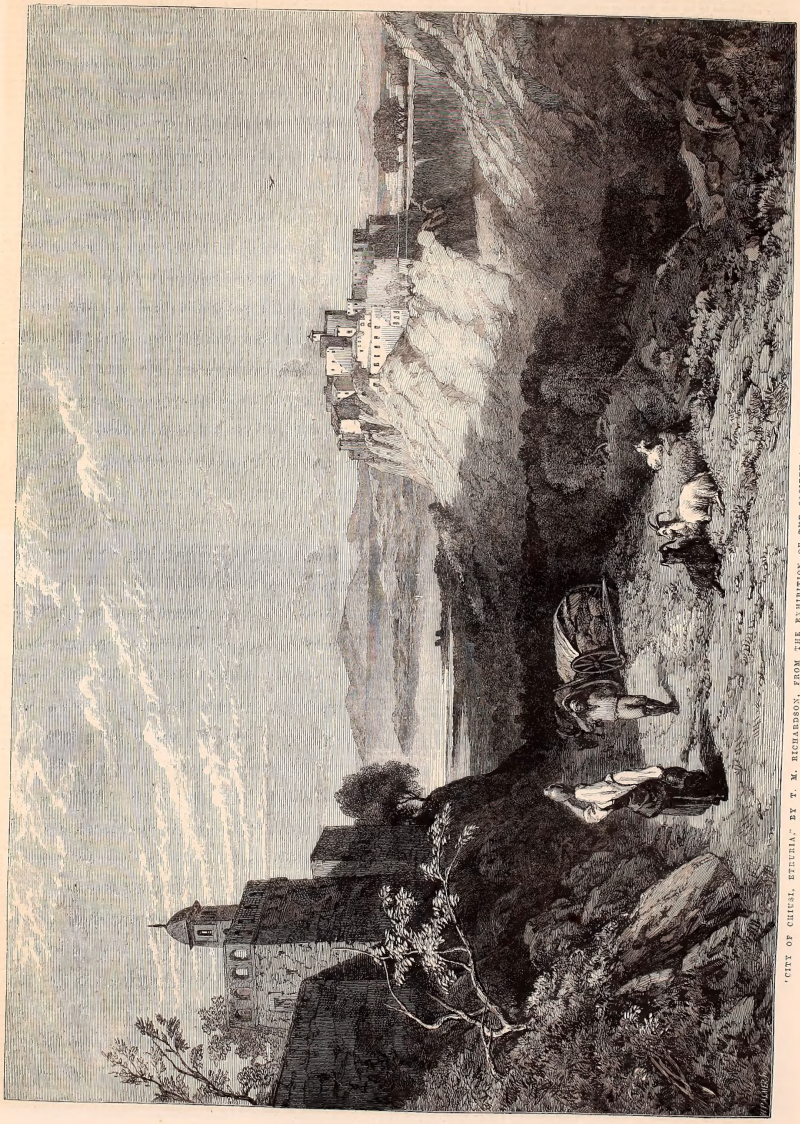
We remarked in May last, when we engraved Mr. F. Woolen's "John Gilpin," that the "Ballads and adventures of Mr. Jorkins" and Mr. Border—as described, for instance, in Scott's "Minstrelsy"—offer endless subjects for the artist, but have hitherto been neglected, except by the painter of that picture. We should, however, have excepted another very promising painter, Mr. Beavis. But we had not then seen the clever and sound-looking picture of Mr. Jorkins which we now engrave. In the present picture, by Mr. Beavis, we have the Border, as a matter of course, the marauder, notorious for lifting cattle, evidently a more chivalric and important personage—a Border chieftain, or at least a man who has only been obliged to go for his life, leave fighting even more than plundering. Our impression is confirmed by the quotation which follows the title in the catalogue of the recently-opened Exhibition of the Royal Academy, where the picture was exhibited :—

The moonlight raid, the morning fight.

This is a quotation from the fourth canto of Scott's "Lay of the Last Minstrel," and describes the exploits of Lord of Harden. We may even suppose that the picture represents this very marauding chief in his younger days :—

Not even the Flower of Yarrow's charms,
In youth, might scare his rage for arms.

After all, the exploits of these border raids and reprisals were generally very similar, whether English or Scotch were the depredators. There was the evening, the moonlight, the signal, and firing of stronghold or village; then, the muster of defenders, the consequent fight, and, sooner or later, the flight before superior numbers. Our artist has caught the stern feeling a fresh and thrilling interest in the Border-stories of daring exploit and hairbreadth escape. And in saying that the picture is full of spirit, so vividly placed before us by Mr. Beavis, and that, too, threatening a Border fere, who, indeed, is having nothing his own way, the horse, mounted, has evidently had to have done mischief enough for many, and who even now seems half disposed to turn upon his persuers—can we say more in praise of the picture? We cannot wrongfully, in concluding a wish that the carbine-bullet will miss, so that, on his powerful horse, he may soon leave his pursuers, and, as the title seems to promise, may safely effect his "escape"?



"THE REVERSE OF FORTUNE."

In our late notice of the Paris Exhibition of Fine Arts for the present year we alluded to this picture. The subject is sufficiently expressive to render a detailed description unnecessary; but how beautiful the artist expresses in her work what noblemen call expression we perceive in the face and attitude of this bereaved woman as she offers her jewels for sale to the calculating Jew! Her child, who is constantly old enough to comprehend the extent of the misfortune, appears to sympathise with the mother's grief. The whole picture, which manifestly deprecates the value of the offered jewels, is drawn with remarkable power, and painted in a manner which strongly reminds us of the excellence of the late Mr. Hemsley, Shepherd. The exhibition of "The Reverse of Fortune," Mdlle. Amanda Foughere has displayed the same high order of excellence which she has so often shown, and the same depth of sentiment which have characterised her previous contributions to the Salons of the Palais de l'Industrie, Paris, where her works always attract much of the public admiration.

An elegantly-bound album, containing a set of entirely new photographs of the Royal Family, has been issued by Messrs. A. Marion, Son, and Co., of Soho-square.

The new instrument of Mr. Rowsell, called the Graphoscope, by which photographs of any singer description may be subjected to a powerful magnifying lens, is calculated to be of great advantage to view those who are short-sighted, and clearly discerned by the naked eye.

The new Act to extend the Factory Acts has been printed, and contains several important provisions. The object of the statute is twofold—to provide for the effectual cleansing and ventilation of factories and to regulate the labour of children, young persons, and women employed therein. The factories to which the Act applies are those used for the manufacture of earthenware (except bricks and tiles), the manufacture of lucifer matches, of percussion-caps, of cartridges, paper-staining, and the finishing of lace, and of fustian cutting, and any process incidental to such fustian cutting. An occupier of a factory may not employ more than 6d. With the view of the possibility of receiving £10 per hour, and to ensure cleanliness and ventilation, which rules are to be approved of by the Secretary of State; and if a child, which rules are to be approved of by the Secretary of State; and if a person employed in the factory should make default not to be taken in factories penalty of £1. The Act provides that medical certificates of fitness for employment for the purposes mentioned, and also prescribes the age of children to be employed—not under eleven years of age.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

THE "extra-parliamentary utterances" and the "silly season" have set in severely with the newspapers. Letters upon all subjects, from the successive dotters to the little gaps of large or regius- cide, as practised amongst bees, at once amuse and astonish us; and, finally, have been all through the Session uncivilly cast neglected, dare to peep out in the public press, and to show their coy little noses in the columns of a review. The last subject involved in what is styled "a storm in a tea-cup" is the sweet and ready resource of moral men, and bankrupts of bigamy mere beggarly shambles, finds a magician, and the author—alas, for the touch, and artistic feeling. Such are the plums which make our literary pudding, and which we anti-industrial Jack Horners pick out while lying on the beach at Scarborough, or walking the bright, dry streets of London-super-Mare. The next books—shall course, murder, conspiracy that eternal thing, the Napoleon, or a concluding volume of volumes conclude? When will the Napier family shut up? We put Revelations, and with due deference, we ask, When does not one correspondence of the Emperor Napoleon I. be brought to a conpublished?

Luckily, as we have nothing to talk about, the weather has put in its claim, and the great drought, which is, or has been, the greatest we have had for some seven years or more, has kindly filled up the important space in the Echoes of our dinner tables. Sad stories of paper mills, and all mills worked by water power, being stopped have been told; and, in addition to the evil of the poor losing their work, we have had a paund, and of sheep dying for want of water. When does not one the accounts of the drought have been exaggerated, and in the north and south eastern parts of England it may be said to be at an end. The Lawes will be an average good one. The drought, we find from letters and advices, has extended itself not only through Europe but to India and also to America, except, perhaps, to that celebrated Valley, the producer of which the Confederates have so kindly reaped for the Federals. But if the crop of wheat, barley, and oats is to be one of total troubles springs up finely. Mr. Fessenden appeals from the bankers to the people himself, for a loan to pay the arrears of the army. Mr. Vallandigham, "with several thousand others," is in prison; and, which touches us more nearly, a North-Western confederation, Northern ladies, have, by the deliberation, decided that Captain Semmes and the crew rescued by the Deerhound are worthy with all of war, United States. Here, then, is a very pretty little bone for John Bull, and Uncle Sam to amuse themselves in picking.

A number of gentlemen who have sympathies with Mrs. Longworth-Yelverton have already commenced collecting a subscription for the purpose of that gentlemanly lady. We cannot help approving their generous enthusiasm, even while we ask them a leading question. One calls to mind the proud and grand saying of Cato, that "while the good cause warpa shad," and feels that it is a duty to support the cause of the who are in such distress, or in any kind of misery or oppression. The law has not been kind to Mrs. Yelverton; it has been very fair; very few of its quirks, and has a double sense; it is so obscure that it Judges four will confuse it, and so intricate that four another; it really our many thousand lawyers, is done not one to devote his energies and his life to the purification and simplification of the law, for the benefit of their fatal act like the charmed shirt of Nessus? will it cling around us till our death?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is not so acute a statesman as we and many others believe him to be if he cannot be give notice next Session of a very sweeping alteration in the Income-tax. Complaints, and a present dozens of letters attest that it is absolutely of the utmost danger for any one to become a member of Parliament. Even Cobbett and all else wonderful clerks of Mr. Disraeli's sketching, at cruquet, comes down upon the Income-tax. Rather than fight the Crown, and having a very wholesome dread of that "pot ask, no virtue extant? The indignation of The, there, is this state of things is natural enough, and Mr. Gladstone will do well to attend to it. The Jupiter of the dark lane of Downing Chancellor to Empson and Dudgeon, who in Henry VIII.'s time revived such names as Crafty and Sly unanimously applied to people who rudely touch his pocket. The fact seems to be that this unfortunate Income-demand man has gone on long enough. No doubt there is much to be said on the other side; but, nevertheless, it is a most unfortunate thing for property that Parliament is so anxious to open to further claim. The assessment ought to be considered settled after the lapse of two, or at the most three, years. The idea of a man's son coming now for part of a legacy which was distributed in the year 1824 is something preposterous.

Denmark is divided and Germany is—not content. Schleswig-Holstein, and Lauenburg and many adjacent islands, will pass over to Germany, and own the mild reign and light government of the Prussian Monarchs no longer. At the extreme point of Jutland, too, the lodgings of the troops and officials connected with the signalling will be changed, if there is grim sarcasm in the assurance that, after these expenses are paid, the "surplus of the ordinary revenue" is to be considered settled but cold comfort. The half friends of the dismembered kingdom, or rather the Shrubite, friends of Job, when they tell her, "Denmark," they say, "must look Pope laid down, which of his possessions and he vowed to play his part game with the rest. There is hardly any reason to be Englishman who does not feel humiliated and ashamed at this news. Nay, only ourselves are disturbed that he absolutely refuses to do so. The gentleman is so indeed, the poor Danes have already, it would seem, had enough of prophetical cheer's "Great Tribulation." So far back as 1859, it be a tripartite division of Europe, and the division to take place is into the Pan-Sclavonic, Pan-Teutonic, and Pan-Latin Governments, and pieces of, and arrangements, Mackay and Whitworth: Coles and Reed defend us! Where are we to go? Will they divide us? Will kingdoms and names belonged to Russia, Ireland to its beloved France, and England to its more than ancient friendship with Germany, that admirable race, and less than kind? Does Garibaldi share in the depression caused by these threatening prospects? From private advices we hear that his health does not improve, and that he is obliged to take to bed often down with disappointment, and that he fears that, after all, his dream of an Italy united and free from the Alps to the Mediterranean, from the Gulf of Genoa to the Adriatic, will never be a reality, at least while he lives.

Mr. Tennyson's new poem "Enoch Arden"—the name has been changed from "Hyde of the Sea Cliff"—has been partly seen by reviewers, although, as we write, the book is actually published. The poem, or short story, gives the title; the remainder is made of very remarkable one. The Laureate treads the same ground, but in a different step, as Robert Browning in his "Caliban on Setebos," that is, he gives a vivid picture of a low, brutal instinct reasoning on the power of the Almighty. In Tennyson's poem the farmer is about to meet his God, and the picture of the moment, obstinate, dying soul is remarkable. Contrast it with the last part of the "May Queen," another deathbed, and read it with all its rough, north-country dialect, and the reader will find one of the most vivid and remarkable dialect, the language. The dialect is as well preserved as in those charming pieces written by a poet too little known, Edwin Waugh.

THE THEATRES.

A new farce, written by the author of "Toi on parle Français," and entitled "My Wife's Maid," was produced at the Adelphi on Monday. It is very amusing and full of bustle, but depends on account of either the nature or the number of its incidents. For these the author substitutes his skill in producing confusion by means of disguises and affairs. Mr. Lysimachus Tooter (Mr. J. L. Toole), a young man with romantic tendencies, who pretends to be a member of Parliament to his inamorata (Miss Oliver), whom he meets in Battersea-fields, on the other part too, assumes the character of a lady's maid, and The romantic youth is betrothed to Miss Amanda Whiffleton (Mrs. A. Swanborough), but manifests a strange shyness in the course of his courtship, owing to his mind having been filled with notions of female attire. But he has to dine with Mrs. Whiffleton, who has also invited Captain Whiffleton (Mr. R. Phillips), a man of mysterious and disposed to jealousy. Somehow suspicion, and in the object of Tooter's regard has excited his ands an affray with his wife. Acting upon the apprehension that more than one violent scene will follow, the latter, harassed with the discovery that his supposed lady is Mr. Tooter, his servant. Several complications ensue, and then take place until the statement that he has married the maid is made the case. Barbara Perkins, the sentimental maid-servant, disgusted at finding that Tooter is a man, and not a lady, as after all, exactly explains the circumstances and the mysterious conduct of Tooter, and by her grace her the dress which she Barbara, and Mr. Toole begs all to favour into the sentimentalities of the romantic youth. Mr. Paul Bedford was at home in the character of Mr. Whiffleton, whose grandlicence was unbounded, and pointed as a model housewife should be. Mr. Phillips, in the Captain, was the cause of much fun, and the new farce may be considered successful.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

RESPIRATION OF FLOWERS.—The following is a resumé of the researches on this subject lately made by the Academy of Sciences by M. Garreau:—1. Flowers, in a limited atmosphere of common air, absorb oxygen and give off carbonic acid in proportions which vary. 2. The cases in which these flowers absorb more oxygen than they exhale are those phenomena become identical, the proportion of carbonic acid to that of oxygen with the plant and whose weight is equal. 3. Generally, for flowers cut from the stem, the absorption of oxygen is greater than the quantity of carbonic acid, but there are some cases in which the experiments is made under a greater or less degree of light than when in extreme darkness. 4. The ordinary air is richer in oxygen than it is become more marked. 5. The flower is not developed in proportion to its this may be due to a more energetic assimilation, which has attained its complete development, or else to a more energetic respiration. 6. The flower, in fact, is not an inert statute the flower (the pistil and the stamens) exhale carbonic acid. 7. The elements which enter into the composition of flowers contain the largest quantity of oxygen and give off the largest proportion of carbonic acid.

A NEW HYDRO-CARBON was discovered by M. Belchamp when experimenting on petroleum some years ago, at a temperature between 150 deg. and 180 deg. He found that the most volatile portion of petroleum, which he called "petrolene," was the best point of xylene and cumene. After some time and labour, he succeeded in obtaining a quantity of a liquid to which he gave the name of "benzoline," and which he subjected to various purifying processes. This substance he now describes (in a communication to the Academy of Sciences) as being perfectly colourless, and as possessing, in some cases, a density or rather of that of toluene, but more frequently, with an odour reminding him of that of boiling peas. It is very volatile, and possesses other properties which will distinguish it from the other homologues of benzole. Further researches are promised when more complete data on the subject, and promises to communicate any new results obtained.

THE GAUT OF NEW CALEDONIA.—In the Annals of Natural History we find a few additional particulars concerning the animal in a letter from Dr. Macgillivray of Sydney, read to the Zoological Society. The animals are rather plentiful in the forests of New Caledonia, and are hunted by means of a slip-knot on a strong stretch of ground that certain there are two species, the one very different from the other. The smaller species is the one described by Dr. Segot is a female of the other. The smaller and much handsomer one is described by Dr. Macgillivray as having a "dark brown fur, with a white throat and generally of darker plumage. These two kinds do not interbreed with dark stripes together. These two kinds do not interbreed with each other. The smaller kind, as Dr. Macgillivray himself had them, they were always fighting; and, although always getting the worst of the battle, they would not desist. The larger kind is said to be very destructive to the molecules of ordinary oxygen as an excited condition. The molecules of ordinary oxygen as an excited condition. NATIONAL SPORTS.

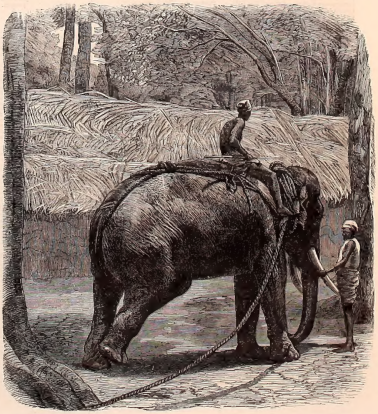
THE "Queen of Watering-places" was never more numerously visited upon, not even "when George the Third was King" and the future Fourth Regent, than during the late Brighton meeting. The standard of hotel and other charges during race-time is at all places a source of approbation to intending visitors, and Brighton was always allowed to take high rank in that line. But extortion will sooner or later prove its own avenger; and while the direct and quick communication with London has been eagerly embraced by the metropolitan, who return London has been eagerly embraced by the metropolitan, who return home to rail in England—with its luxurious comforts and moderate fares, to dwell at length upon the miseries of Brighton—a Sussex "Tom Tiddler's ground" where "everything is nothing" and "nothing is everything"—the Grand Hotel—the "Escurial" of such day to their friends, which exacted an enormous tribute for bread, service, &c., "Strange, but he can get better winners in France than he could in England!" We are not surprised to hear on Wednesday that Earl Poulett was elected a member of the worth noting, except that Earl Poulett was elected a member of the Brighton Race Club. A Plate of 100 sovs. on Thursday was the occasion of a "scene." The rider, T. Adams, on Anti-Macassar, who run second, was so very glaring that on returning into the inclosure he was assailed with the choicest epithets of the turf vocabulary; indeed, had the jockey any sensibility left after his exertions to play the part of Captain Armstrong, he must have wished himself anywhere but in Brighton.

The Lewes meeting has of late years brought up the rear of the series of horse gatherings. This, of the least pretentious of our ventures of the enterprising and popular lessee and clerk of the course, may be safely pronounced his best, both as regards the advantage accruing to himself and the character of the sport afforded to the public. The meeting, as a whole, was everything that could be wished: but there was one slight hitch on the second day (Saturday), which may not pose "the Admiral" himself, should he be appealed to. Hope, entered for the Railway Nursery Handicap, was handed in the weights appeared, on the first day of Brighton races. Messrs. Weatherby properly considered that, her owning colours having been altered, she was out of the hands of the handicapper, who, therefore, did not include her name in the handicap, and they consequently returned her as "drawn" in the next issue of the Racing Calendar. The owner of the second horse, Mr. James Smith, than whom a more straightforward and genuine sportsman does not exist in England, was somewhat sore on the point; but he scorns the idea of a petty or frivolous "objection," and he will most likely leave it to the sense of justice and fairness of the Jockey Club in dealing with the question.

Of turf gossip, generally, there is a dearth, almost as much so there has been of rain. Bloodless may pronounce us, but the Derby under a new ownership; he is announced for sale, his price being 1000 gs. Lord Bateman has by no means made up his mind to abandon it, however, just now, more especially after having given the turf pursuit of a popular sport, more especially after having given the turf pursuit of a popular sport, more especially after having given the turf pursuit of a popular sport

MODE OF CAPTURING WILD ELEPHANTS IN CEYLON.



AN ELEPHANT KRAAL, WITH THE "GRAND STAND" FOR ENGLISH VISITORS.

"Mr. Jayatelike, of Kornegalle, and Conburewattewelle Kattenahatmeya." The former of these gentlemen, especially, is much praised by the Colombo newspapers for the consummate generalship which he displayed. The first elephant which got into the kraal, having drunk too greedily of the pool after being deprived of water for so many days, fell down and died. About twenty more elephants came in that night. On the next morning, Tuesday, the 25th, the interior of the kraal presented a curious scene. The thirsty and famished animals were pacing restlessly to and fro in the tank, or pond, which their feet had churned into a fetid mass of black mud, with the dead elephant lying in the midst. They looked a complete picture of woe and despair. Sometimes one would stop to heap the mud over his head and back in a manner expressive of hopeless misery. Sometimes one would stroke with his trunk the body of his prostrate comrade. An elephant, bolder than the rest, would head a feeble attempt to charge through the barriers, but would be frightened back by a few shouts from the people who were perched on the palisade. There were several calves, with their dams, in this herd; and one little fellow, not much bigger than a pig, walking between its mother's fore legs, and protected by her trunk, as it pitifully floundered about in the mud, and at last fell fast asleep, in spite of the commotion around it, won the sympathy and commiseration of the ladies. They had a large space of the inclosure cleared for them, in front of the grand stand, to give them a good view of the proceedings. This was done, in a very summary fashion, by the aid of two tame elephants belonging to the roads department. Crash went tree after tree, as the mighty beasts pressed their foreheads against them and broke them down with the facile but resistless power of a hydraulic ram. When the trees were prostrated, the branches were crushed to the ground by the feet and trunks of these untiring and sagacious levellers. A few of the larger trees were left standing, to which the wild elephants might be securely bound. The first elephant noosed was a fine young animal of two years of age. He was singled out of the herd by a couple of tame tuskers, and driven by them from the tank. As he was stepping over the trunk of a prostrate tree a noose was adroitly slipped round one of his hind legs. Finding himself a captive, after a few efforts to break the cord, he threw himself on the ground with a loud cry, and was dragged off by the leg, by one of the tuskers, like a sack of potatoes, into the open space in front of the grand stand. The two tuskers then placed themselves on each side of him, and after a vigorous resistance he was bound by three of his legs to a tree and firmly secured. Often the unfortunate beast made frantic efforts to regain his liberty; sometimes trying to tear away the cords with his trunk, sometimes pulling with all his might against the relentless fetters; occasionally, in utter despair, he would dash himself upon the ground, uttering piteous cries to his dam, who stood close by looking on in sulky silence and expressing her maternal sorrow by heaping dust upon her head. To describe the noosing of one elephant is to describe the noosing of all. In every case there was the same unavailing resistance, the same ultimate exhaustion. Nothing was more remarkable than the contrast between the kind consideration shown by the tame elephants in their treatment of the young wild ones and the severity with which they reduced the older and more refractory ones to submission. During the process of noosing a young one they would try and coax him into obedience by stroking him with their trunks, and even putting choice pieces of cocoanut into his mouth; while they did not hesitate to plunge their trunks into the flesh of an old one, but not before all other means of quieting his resistance had been tried and failed. When the noosed elephant had remained tied for a few hours, and his spirit was somewhat broken, he was led down to the river between two of the tame ones, being firmly secured by ropes which were passed round his neck and the necks of his conductors. In one case an elephant more refractory than the rest required an escort of five tame ones to lead him to the river. Here the poor animals were able at last to slake their burning thirst and lave their heated bodies in the fresh, cool water of the river, which they drank and drank again with ever-renewed avidity. After that they were led back and secured to different trees in the neighbourhood of the kraal. We must not forget the ceremony of naming the elephant; this takes place when the animal is first mounted by a rider. A young elephant, which was assigned to Jayatilake Modliar, was formally bestridden within a few minutes of its noosing, and received from him the name of Horetella, or "Darling." The number of elephants captured was forty-five, three of which died. The rest of the herd were allowed to escape.

NEW MUSIC.

MOZART'S "MIRELLA" is slowly and surely making way. Built upon a subject rather lyrical than dramatic, its truth of expression is to be found in the music which every additional hearing renders more attractive. "Mirella's" first song, "Sulla sponda del ruscello," embodies a pastoral idea, as charming as easily comprehended. The duet, "Mirella—follow closely the same principles as "Farà," and, though founded on a subject as different in all respects, is not less spirited, quite as genuine, and, if we are not mistaken, will, in the end, be found as popular. "Mirella, ben mio," is a song for the whole of the music of the world—the Antipodes included.

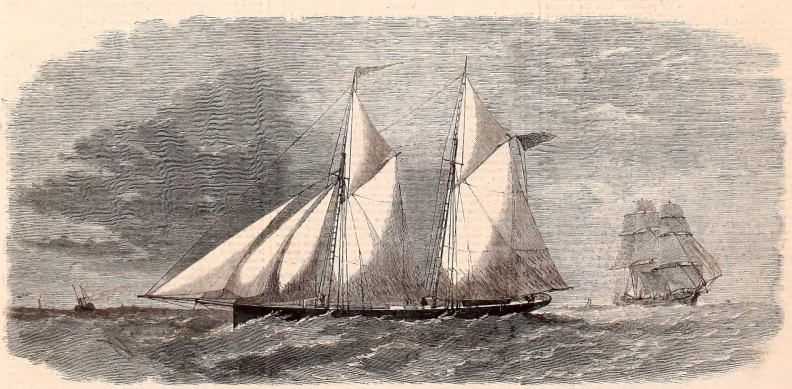
F. LEIGHTON, A.R.A. E. W. COOKE, R.A. E. B. STEPHENS, A.R.A. P. H. CALDERON, A.R.A.



THE LAST-ELECTED MEMBER AND ASSOCIATES OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

SINCE our biographical notices of Messrs. Boxall, Weekes, Goodall, and Lejeune, upon the promotion of the three first-named from the rank of Associate of the Royal Academy to that of full membership, and the election of the last to be an Associate, the artists whose portraits are engraved have also been elected. Mr. Cooke has passed from among the Associates into the higher grade, and Messrs. Stephens, Leighton, and Calderon have attained the preliminary degree of A.R.A. Besides these changes and additions, Mr. Millais has been elevated among the "first forty;" but, as a portrait and biographical notice of that distinguished and popular artist have already appeared in our columns, we need not repeat them on this occasion. The four Portraits are engraved from photographs taken by Messrs. J. and C. Watkins, of Parliament-street.

E. W. COOKE, R.A., F.R.S.

Mr. Cooke, the eminent marine and landscape painter, is the son of a distinguished engraver, and was born in London, in 1811. His first effort in art consisted in drawing the plants illustrating the "Botanical Cabinet" and "London's Encyclopedia." He afterwards turned his attention to views of shipping of which he etched and published a large collection. In 1833 he commenced painting in oil, and has frequently visited Italy, France, Spain, Africa, and Holland in the prosecution of his art. He was elected an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1851. It would be impossible within our limits to enumerate a tithe of the large pictures by this artist, and the number of small studies and pocket-book memoranda he has executed is very great. Suffice it to say, that the great majority of Mr. Cooke's larger pictures are views off Holland and Venice, with shipping, varied in recent years by some views off the coast of Spain and the opposite seaboard of Morocco, Barbary, and Tangiers. The painter's many versions of Venetian subjects are generally, when compared to the illusory idealisations, more or less, of Prout, Turner, Holland, and some others, very remarkable for their matter-of-fact truthfulness and serviceable for their corrective reality. Perhaps the most noteworthy exception to Mr. Cooke's favourite subjects was the representation of "H.M.S. Terror in the Ice of a Frozen Strait," exhibited in 1860. The scientific attainments of the artist, frequently evinced in his accurate depiction of natural phenomena, was not long since recognised by the Royal Society in their election of him as a Fellow. Mr. Cooke has displayed a great deal of benevolent feeling in regard to the establishment of life-boat stations along the coast. As we stated recently, on the occasion of engraving a picture by him of "The Ramsgate Life-boat," he has not only given the production of his pencil in furtherance of this excellent object, but he has contributed at one time a donation of £200 for the same purpose.

The prime characteristic of Mr. Cooke's art is literal fidelity to nature. He is probably the most scientifically accurate painter we possess. His pictures not merely gratify the lovers of realism in art by their exact reproduction of the outward aspects of the natural world, but they satisfy the geologist, botanist, meteorologist, architect, and shipbuilder. Thus his works have a kind of documentary as well as art value: they are in the highest degree instructive as well as pleasing. While the artist admires in them extreme skill and truth of imitation and great technical finish and completeness, the man of science draws from them trustworthy data for his conclusions, and the traveller or cosmical student finds in them abundant materials to refresh his memory or enlarge his knowledge.

THE WEST HARTLEY NO. 1, A NEW FLAT-BOTTOMED SCHOONER FOR THE COAL TRADE OF NEW SOUTH WALES.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

Mr. Cooke's conscientious and scrupulous respect for the facts which he sets himself to record has led to his being sometimes described as a "topographical" painter; or, with Stanfield, Creswick, and David Roberts (especially in their earlier and more careful styles), as a "prosaic" painter. But, except for the purpose of compendious characterisation, and so implying much more than they literally mean, these terms would be very unjust as applied to this painter. True it is that his works are unusually descriptive of the topography of a scene, and hence they have the simple directness and comparative want of suggestiveness of prose in them; but they have many indications of artistic feeling in the choice of subject and point of view, but, above all, in the selection of effect. What "topographical" painter could paint the "terror of tempest" as Mr. Cooke has done? Is there, to muscular Christianity, a poetry in this painter's presentation of the wild, wet disaster of the German Ocean, with its black storm-cloud pinions driving through maddening waves the dancing life-boat, the drifting galiot, or wounded Indiaman beyond? Is there not a touch of sheer art in there no sweet sentiment of Nature's loveliness and glory in some of this painter's later versions of the glowing sky and golden sea, where the sun sinks beneath the glittering domes and campanili which fringe the Venetian lagune? We have the utmost reverence for the higher manifestations of imaginative power in art, but rather than anything short of this—rather than that pretentious mediocrity which is so numerous here as in poetry—give us the honest, manly, truthful, if any so like to term it, of such a "topographical" painter as Mr. Cooke.

EDWARD BOWRING STEPHENS, A.R.A.

Mr. Edward Stephens, one of the best and most promising of our younger sculptors, is a native of Bodmin, Cornwall, which has been connected with some of the artist's most important works. At a comparatively early age he became articled pupil for five years to one of the very eminent sculptor Mr. E. H. Baily, now on the list of voluntarily-retired Royal Academicians. In 1843 the young student gained the silver medal of the Royal Academy, for a bas-relief entitled "The Battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ." Subsequently, he studied for three years in that great school of design for sculptors—even as than painters—Rome. Since Mr. Stephens commenced his independent professional career he has produced and exhibited, principally at the Royal Academy, numerous works, of which the following may be instanced as amongst the most remarkable—viz., a lifesize marble statue of the late Lord Rollo, sculptured for Pitcairnfield, Perthshire; a large group of "Satan Tempting Eve;" another large group of "Satan Vanquished" (both in the Great Exhibition of 1851); a lifesize figure of "A Decrstalker;" "Eve Contemplating Death" (1853); "Group of Ecphocryne and Cupid" (1856); "Mercy on the Battle-field" (1858); and "The Angel of the Resurrection" (1861). In 1862 Mr. Stephens contributed to the Academy Exhibition the model for a colossal statue of Peace, or "Sir Thomas Dyke Acland," afterwards executed in marble and erected at Exeter. Last year the sculptor exhibited a model for another large statue for his native city—that of the late "Earl Fortescue," in his Peer's robes, which has been executed in marble and lately erected by public subscription; also, a marble statue of the "Earl of Lonsdale," seated, which was placed in the centre of the sculpture-gallery, and, although quite a recent production, the artist was very generally admired; and a third larger work in marble—a statue of "Alfred the Great," commissioned by the Corporation of the city of London, and placed as one of the series of statues on the new colonnade of the Egyptian Hall in the Mansion House. This current year Mr. Stephens has exhibited a model for a bronze statue of the late Duke of Bedford, in peer's robes, now about to be erected in Tavistock, besides these noteworthy poetical and memorial sculptures—the variety and merits of which prove the range of the artist's powers and the advantages he has derived from his early and thoroughly professional education—Mr. Stephens has executed many busts of eminent and illustrious men. Mention should also be made of two small marble figures in bas-relief, commissioned by the late Prince Consort as part of the "Comus" decorations of the summer-house of the gardens of Buckingham Palace. We think it due to the sculptor, A.R.A., to add that he should not be confounded with another sculptor of the same surname. We ourselves inadvertently attributed the satisfactory statue of the late Sir Isaac Goldsmid to St. Pauls's to Mr. "Edward" instead of Mr. Alfred Stevens—the latter being the sculptor who, as we rightly observed (then, as since, unknown in the country gained the first premium for one of the two colossal figures for the Pediment of the Royal Exchange, but who failed on the first interment in a competition from which several of the most able English sculptors abstained to enter), was selected some few years back, by Lord John Manners to execute his model for a Wellington monument to be placed in the Cathedral of St. Paul's, and is comprising a dome, and canopy, and horse on the top! But of this model we have not since heard.

FREDERICK LEIGHTON, A.R.A.

Whatever diversity of opinion may exist as to inspecting some characteristics of Mr. Leighton's art, it is universally admitted that no English painter's works are distinguished in a greater or perhaps equal degree by the attribute of style—that is to say, as pursued on the Continent by long and uninterrupted adherence to the examples and traditions of the schools, especially, perhaps, in this instance, that of Venice. It will interest the reader to find, from the following particulars of Mr. Leighton's earlier life, that this great advantage (as it unquestionably is, rightly used) has been attained by a longer course of foreign study and practice than perhaps any other English painter has pursued.

The artist was born at Scarborough, Dec. 3, 1830, and from childhood evinced a strong passion for painting. His parents generously encouraged inasmuch as they gave him every opportunity for gratifying it. They could not, however, for some years his desire to study art with a view to making it a profession. His first systematic instruction in drawing were received at Rome in the winter of 1842-3, from a painter since dead, named Filippo Gigli. In 1843-4 he was allowed to enter as a student the Royal Academy of Berlin. Then followed a companion and childhood friend for art's sake, with whom this embryo painter was receiving his general education at a school at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, spare moments only being afforded for drawing. The winter of 1845-6 was passed in Florence, and here it was the father at last yielded to the son's desire to embrace painting as a profession. Some directions by the young student were then submitted to the celebrated American sculptor, Hiram Powers (for many years a resident at Florence), and the father promised that his decision should depend on the sentiments of his interviewed friend. The estimate of the drawings formed by Powers being highly favourable, the youthful Leighton was permitted to study (in Florence) to devote the whole of his time to painting. Part of the time from 1846 to 1848 he studied in the Academy of Frankfort-on-the-Maine. The winter of 1848-9 was passed in Brussels, painting his first finished picture, which represented the story of Cimabue finding Giotto drawing in the fields. The succeeding year or so was spent in Paris, copying in the Louvre and attending a life-school. Thence he returned to Frankfort, where he became, and continued till the early part of 1853, a pupil of Edouard Steinle, of Vienna (one of the followers of Overbeck), professor of historical painting at the Academy of this town. Following a custom very common abroad, but, though well deserving imitation, almost unknown in this country, the young English pupil often worked in the professor's studio and helped to execute his (Steinle's) works. And this period several pictures were painted by Mr. Leighton, amongst others a large one of "The Death of Brunelleschi." Here also the artist's winter seasons were next passed at Rome in diligent study and in painting the "picture of Cimabue," represented during the procession (consisting in the picture of Cimabue, his scholars, and admiring Florentine contemporaries) which is said to have accompanied, with great honour and rejoicing, through the streets of Florence to the church of Santa Maria Novella, Cimabue's picture of the Madonna. The exhibition of this work by Mr. Leighton at the Royal Academy, in 1855, was a great surprise to the British public, coming as it did from an artist unknown in England. It was at once purchased by the Queen, and it has been re-exhibited at the Manchester Art-Treasures and the International Exhibitions. Every succeeding appearance of the painter has been regarded with great interest; but it seems to be the general opinion that he has produced no work to compare with the Cimabue picture in importance till the "Dante in Exile" of the recently closed Academy exhibition. During four years after this early and great success the artist resided in Paris, studying, however, under no master, though aided by the counsel of Ary Scheffer, Robert Fleury, and other French painters; subsequently he has lived in London. In 1856 Mr. Leighton contributed a picture to the Academy exhibition entitled "The Triumph of Music," the subject being Orpheus by the power of his art redeeming his wife from Hades. The Greek fable of Orpheus and Eurydice, it should be remembered, was the subject for a picture in the last exhibition. The following are the titles of the principal pictures exhibited subsequently:—"The Fisherman and the Syren," from a ballad, by Goethe; and "Scene from Romeo and Juliet" (1858); "Looking at the Happy Autumn Fields," &c. (1859); "Cymon—Iphigenia" (1860); "Paolo and Francesca" (1861); "Lesbia and "Leeher ohne Worte" (1861); "Odaliaque," "The Star of Bethlehem," and "Michael Angelo Studying his Dying Servant" (1862); "Abdallah and Zerebel," "A Girl feeding Peacocks," "A Girl with a Basket of Pomegranates," and "Greek Cantharus-vase" (1863). The pictures in the last Academy exhibition have already been mentioned, with the exception of "Golden Hours." The artist has been long engaged upon an elaborate composition painted over the arch opposite the Royal Chantry, which we intend to review at an early opportunity. Mr. Leighton has also exercised many pleasing and successful designs, among which may be named the illustrations to George Eliot's "Romola" and "Dr. Dunsbe."

The great danger of such academic and Continental art-training as Mr. Leighton has enjoyed, and of such technical mastery as that to which he has attained, is mannerism, and a slipshod or artistically too far removed from nature. If Mr. Leighton's works have been criticised in this and other journals for their tendency in those directions, it is, however, but fair that the artist himself, and those who do not feel with the critic, should conclude that the intention has only been to counsel Mr. Leighton to aim at accuracy and truth in minute directness and reality which we firmly believe are alone needed to place him among the very foremost artists of the day.

PHILIP H. CALDERON, A.R.A.

Mr. Calderon, as might be inferred by his patronyme (which, we need not say, is that of one of the greatest dramatists in the age of Spanish extraction. He is the son of the Rev. Juan Calderon, Professor of Spanish literature at King's College, and who was, we believe, the first to introduce the study of that tongue into this country. The subject of this notice was born at Poitiers, in France, May, 1833, and is consequently now only thirty-one years of age. He came over to England with his family in 1846, and began, in 1849, to paint pictures in fair girl, which, Leigh, in the school of Art, Newman-street. In the following year he went to Paris to study in the atelier of M. Picot (Membre de l'Institut), a celebrated French artists of the pure Academic style. In 1857 (after producing several minor pictures, remarkable chiefly for their careful drawing) Mr. Calderon exhibited (at Suffolk-street Gallery) his first picture (a "Procession") at the Royal Academy the pathetic picture, since engraved, entitled "Broken Vows," illustrative of one of Longfellow's most popular and supremely touching poems. The grouping and faltering limb, bearing through a garden fence her faithless lover during his return to fair girl, wedding ring overhand. Thenceforward Mr. Calderon has been a regular and prominent exhibitor. In 1858 appeared "The Gaoler's Daughter," a touching incident from the French Revolution; in 1859 "Philip Melancthon pleading Peace between Edward" in 1859 another touching picture of "French Refugees on the Revocation of Nantes Edict;" in 1860 a party of salmagundas or strolling players, by whom it had been arranged and rehearsed, are seen in a barn, regaling with the motto, "Man goeth forth to his work and his labour." Mr. Calderon continued to show a predilection for subjects of pathetic or mournful interest—which may be traced to the artist's strickenhood by the recent and frequently characteristic of the Spanish temperament—in "Never more," 1861; "Elaine," 1862; "Griselda," 1863; "Griselda Reading the Letter," a soldier finding his sweetheart immured in a convent. "The Young Heir's Birthday" in the Royal Academy Exhibition of the last-mentioned year, 1863, was a picture of considerable and delightful nature in the scene. "La Demande en Mariage," displays a command of landscape-painting unusual with the early works of this painter, and, in particular, was precise and somewhat hard from too-obvious carefulness; in this picture the artist has overcome the objectionable minuteness charm of practical skill. A further step was taken the following year in "After the Battle," a party of English peasants finding a little French peasant child in a cottage deserted by the rest of the family, and one wall battered down by cannon; and "Katherine of Aragon," of course, and "Queen" in 1864, the subject of the two pictures, "The British Embassy in Paris on the Day of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew," and "Mary Queen only with fame (as she will have engraved); and "The Burial of Hampden," it is not necessary to speak, they being too well known, and having been recently reviewed.

Mr. Calderon's rise in popular estimation has been unusually rapid; the glorious as they were unquestionably possessed many elements of sympathies, contributing, probably, in some measure to this result. In the Academy Exhibition of the present year the artist has a picture of the artist's more recent painting justify the anticipation that Mr. Calderon will rank as one of our most distinguished painters in those branches of historical and "sentiment-genre" painting in which his chief successes have already been won.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Cruise of the Alabama and Sumter. (2 vols. Saunders, Otley, and Co.) The name of Captain Semmes, first of the Sumter, afterwards of the Alabama, has gone forth into all lands wherever printed news can penetrate or the trumpet-tongue of fame is heard. Henceforth the name of Semmes is historic, and "290" is a charmed number. Sympathisers with Confederates and sympathisers with Federals were equally on the watch and wonder and admiration as they read first how the Sumter, and then how the Alabama, defying and eluding pursuit, suddenly pounced upon their prey. It seemed that a second Paul Jones had arisen in the person of the Phantom Ship' second to be realised. The Federal cruisers were as much at a loss "as if they dodged a water-spirit," and their conversations must often have crossed in their hearts the laws relating to "the marine league" and to "the twenty-four hours' start," which gave their active and audacious foe so many chances of escape. Whether or destruction of another Sumter nor Alabama was to go on for ever causing joy to friends and despair to foes, it was clear that when the Sumter was "laid up," and a fatal Sunday morning dawned upon which Captain Semmes, in the opinion of some people, lost his head and fought the Kearsarge, and the Alabama shared the same fate of wrecks of Cherbourg. The adventures of the two far-famed vessels are now recounted in two volumes which are records of which every man of the private journals and other papers of Commander R. Semmes, C.S.N., and other officers." The account, no doubt, will be eagerly perused; but the lovers of excitement, the revellers in naval battles, and the admirers of "fire-eating" will find very little to entertain them. The only fight (except that with the land one off Cherbourg) in which Captain Semmes was engaged was one off the coast of Texas, when he, with a superior weight of metal, sunk the U.S. gun-boat Hatteras. For the rest, it is a story of eluding stronger vessels, of weathering storms, of capturing and destroying defenceless ships, of disputing about the laws of neutrality, and of coaling neutral ports. What there should have been nothing is not surprising when Captain Semmes, as one of the Alabama's crew—"Many of my fellows," he says, "thought they were shipping in a sort of privateer, where they would have a jolly good time, and get plenty of prize money. They have been woefully disappointed, for I have jerked them down with a strong hand, and now have a well-disciplined ship-of-war. Punishment invariably follows close upon the heels of the offence. It has taken me three or four months to accomplish this; but when I look back at what my little ship's company consisted of one hundred and ten of the most reckless from the gregarines of Liverpool, this is not much," Joining the list few words with Captain Semmes's remarks on the modern sailor has greatly changed in character; he now sticks for pay like a shaper, and seems to have lost his characteristic virtues of adventure" (vol. i. p. 296); and with the notorious fact that the majority of the Alabama's crew were Englishmen. It is inclined to think that "hatred to the flag of the old Union" (vol. ii. p. 293) was not likely to have been amongst "their chief active passions," and that the only reason they were punctually paid was to keep out of it that which is synonymous with workhouse. That they were attached to their captain there is no doubt, and he was evidently popular with every certain; but their attachment makes it more probable that they fought for "Every brush of the Wyndi's" principle than on any other; and, though "one who was hailed from Kearsarge with the offer of a rescue declined it civilly and made his way for the neutral flag" (vol. ii. p. 293), the reason of this kindness was presumed by fear of being made a prisoner than by a chivalrous "detestation of the Yankee." Of course, all allowance must be made for the defeat of the Alabama; for even at billiards the defeated player discovers something in his cue, or the table, or the pockets which was peculiarly unfavourable to him. So fully recognise his failure; but it is clear that if Captain Semmes was aware that the Kearsarge was unfit to be hailed as a foe, he must have known most of them—he ought to have declined the engagement. Besides, it is not very magnanimous to quote Captain Winslow's statement (vol. ii. p. 294) when they are favourable to the Alabama and to doubt them (p. 279 et seq.) when they are not. We think, too, that the statement concerning the Kearsarge had laid (sic) at anchor close under the critical eye of Captain Semmes. He had no idea of invasion seen that his enemy was not artificially defended." It appears, then, that the Kearsarge was quite willing under these circumstances to fight the Alabama; and as she had been "constructed for fighting purposes," it seems very unlikely that Captain Winslow should have had either inclination or time for getting "iron-clad." It is, nevertheless to read paltry excuses for the misfortune of a gallant gentleman. Captain Semmes fought and lost, and there is an end of it. Insinuations against the truthfulness, fairness, and humanity of his enemy cannot undo the defeat; a dignified silence would have been more becoming. Captain Semmes has done wonderful deeds, and his country has been of wonderful assistance to his cause; it is only to be regretted that his exploits were not as glorious as they were numerous. His presence was to cripple his enemy's commerce, and he did it to a wonder; and it is also the philosopher almost weep to think that so much prudence of human labour—so much expenditure of human beings—should have been ruthlessly sunk in the barren sea, Captain Semmes is ready to publish a second.

Atherstone Priory. By L. N. Comyn. (2 vols. Longmans.) We are introduced at the commencement of this story to a family whose domestic arrangements are a little complicated. Paterfamilias has married a second time, and has two batches of children, towards one set of whom matrimonial ideas and proposals are directed by one mother and towards the other of stepmother. Moreover, a nephew and a niece of hers, themselves only cousins, are living in the house. Now the old song says,

Sixteen we're all by the dozen, Tom; and it is astonishing that materfamilias should have forgotten the songster's wise saying (if she ever heard it), and have had no suspicion that attachments would spring between cousins of different sexes. However, her eyes were eventually opened, and the render will learn both how that matrimonial plan was positions a pretty, wilful, but affectionate girl was wooed and won at last by an ugly, but brave and kindhearted, soldier; how deception on the part of others and misunderstandings on the other parts nearly made them forget for a moment his manliness, blighted their married life, and hurried the former to the battle-field, where, by misfortune, the unfortunate learned charity; how, by devotion, a sister regained a brother's love; and how, by trials and troubles, men and women are chastened and improved. The characters is excellently drawn; there is several exquisite scenes—some amusing, some particularly affecting; and the tone throughout is unexceptionable. As our judgment, however, the tale would have been much better had it been shorter, for the incidents tend to spin out, and there is an occasional heaping up of words which is wearisome.
Fifteen we're all by the dozen, Tom;

Rare Years in the Ionian Islands. Edited by Viscount Kirkwall. (2 vols. Chapman and Hall.) Viscount Kirkwall was Private Secretary in the Ionian Islands, and his position upon the Staff of Sir Henry Ward, several Lord High Commissioners, give him the activities of an authority upon the subject about which he writes. He appears to have written it for his own amusement, and so can be expected if he is not blind to the faults of the British rulers, he does not, on the other hand, hide the difficulties with which they had to contend in consequence of the ignorance of the Ionians and the corruption of government. His first volume is full of information and his second of entertainment. In the former he gives a sketch of the Venetians and other Governments which preceded the British Protectorate, together with a review of the personal character of the administration of the British Governors from Sir Thomas Maitland, popularly known as "King Tom," the first Lord High Commissioner, down to Sir Henry Storks, the tenth and last; and in the latter he has gathered together an interesting collection of remarks upon the physical features of the Seven Islands, upon the habits, manners, and customs of the inhabitants, and upon kindred matters, interspersed with personal and other anecdotes. With respect to the destruction of the fortifications at Corfu, he says: "The English of both sexes were eager spectators, approaching as near as they ventured or were permitted. The Greeks looked on the ruins of Fort Abraham from a greater distance, and at those of Vido from the Line Wall of the town near the sea. Whatever they felt, I myself never saw or heard them express any anger or disgust. One man, however, was overheard by some one exclaiming, just before a rampart was blown up, 'I wish that Lord Russel were on the top of it.' He is, no doubt, correct in saying that "the loss of Corfu, as a naval and military station and as a pleasant winter abode for civilians, will always be deeply and generally regretted." It is well known how highly esteemed as a military station Corfu was by so good a judge as the late Emperor Napoleon I.; but if it were right that it should be given up, and if right should be done though the heavens fall, we cannot regret its cession even though certain civilians thereby lose "a pleasant winter abode."

Wine? The Autobiography of Samuel Basil Carlingford. (1 vol. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co.) The old saying about "a well in sheep's clothing" may be applied to this novel. It is taken up under the impression that it contains a romantic biography, and it turns out to be essentially an advocacy of Hahnemann and homœopathy. Indeed, there is a long chapter dedicated entirely to a biography of Hahnemann and to the praise of homœopathy. It is represented, so far as we can understand, that Samuel Basil Carlingford lost all his children because they were not homœopathically treated; that he was educated as a doctor of the old school, but by personal experience was convinced that there is nothing like homœopathy; that through homœopathy he won a blooming bride; and that by reason of homœopathy he has now three healthy children. Let all who are anxious to learn the secret be affected by "the little chest" read the autobiography of Dr. Carlingford.

Selections from the Letters of Caroline Fremont Carnwallis, the author of "Small Books on Great Subjects," &c. (Thidmer and Co.) A few years ago there appeared a series of essays entitled "Small Books on Great Subjects." The series, which extended to twenty-two numbers and was published anonymously, created a sensation at the time of its issue, both in this country and America. It embraced a number of subjects, classic, scientific, and religious; and all were treated with philosophic force and spirit, in an elegant and graceful style. The authorship was not revealed till after the death of the writer, who proved to be a lady of family and position, Miss Caroline Frances Cornwallis, the last representative of a branch of the old Baronial line which has borne the titles of Baron, Earl, and Marquis successively—names now extinct. Miss Cornwallis was a lady of wonderful acquirements and ability; and, with a courage and energy that resisted a state of almost constant ill-health, produced her life in study and composition: that she did so successfully her "Small Books on Great Subjects" are a lasting testimonial. She died in 1858, leaving to her dear lady friend Miss Brown the secret of her authorship and the story of her praiseworthy literary career. That lady does not, most gracefully and effectively in the volume before us. Her own preface to the book is charmingly written, and the selections from the letters of Miss Cornwallis are full of wit, and of the most critic outpourings, at leisure, of a mind imbued with deep thought, ready wit, and also of gentle and kindly nature. Particularly interesting are the letters Miss Cornwallis addresses to her friend David Power, Esq., a leading Queen's Counsel of the Dublin Circuit, whose prominent and lamented demise occurred in 1862. The poetic address, and one (the first) of the essays on Great Subjects, and some letters that Cornwallis addressed to Mr. Power, hopefully form an appropriate and attractive portion of the volume, and the whole has a charm about it that will recall the brilliant letters and remains of Eugénie de Guérin, and continually reminds one of them, despite the difference of country and of religious opinion. Miss Cornwallis is very English in her domestic and social feelings, and a stanch supporter of the Established Church; but her philosophy takes the widest range, and may be well and beneficially studied by all classes of readers.

THE ROYAL YACHT SQUADRON AT COWES.

THE race for the Queen's Cup, on Thursday week, had been looked for with more interest than any other business of the meeting. Eight yachts were entered, and seven actually started. They were of different sizes, from seventy-four to 216 tons burden; and all of them were schooners, except the Ursuline yawl. To equalise their differences of power, the club had made a handicap arrangement, by which the vessels of greater capacity were to allow so many minutes to their lighter competitors. They took their places thus, when ranged for starting:—The Ursuline, 112 tons, belonging to Mr. Villebois; the Titania, 184 tons, belonging to the Earl of Rosse; the Aline, 216 tons, belonging to Captain Thellusson; the Vestal, 74 tons, belonging to Sir Bruce Chichester; the Albertine, 156 tons, belonging to Lord Londesborough; the Viking, 142 tons, belonging to Mr. J. Jones; and the Intrepid, 75 tons, belonging to the Count du Monceau. The course was from Cowes round the Warner Light, thence to the north round Calshot Light, thence round a mark-boat off "Egypt," and thence to pass between the clubhouse and a mark-boat in the roads. The yachts were to go twice round the course and to keep outside all the buoys and shoal-marks, except the middle buoy and Stuchridge. It was not till half-past ten o'clock that the vessels were placed, and ten minutes later the gun for starting was fired. There was a light south-west wind; the tide had been running easterly, but was nearly done; the sun was brightly shining. All the yachts, at starting, cast a little towards the north. The Albertine and Titania got their sails up well and took a good start, but the Aline obtained the lead off Osborne, by which time the tide was running strong to the west. Near the Quarantine-ground the Albertine, which had set her squaresail, went ahead, and she rounded the Warner six minutes before the Aline. In rounding Calshot Light the Albertine was still first. The Aline had now set her big topsail, which seemed enough to drag along a seventy-four, and she had also a main top-mast staysail; but still she could not catch the Albertine, which only carried ordinary sails. The Viking and Vestal had no fore-gymasts, but set topmast staysails, the Viking's very large. All this canvas (and a breeze now beyond a gaff-topsail breeze) dragged them fast over the tide; in fact, they seemed to despise it, keeping a straight course instead of trying to avail themselves of the back-water, which now began to run under the shore. No further changes took place, and, as they rounded the Warner, the Albertine was still first. The Ursuline gave up off Ryde, at which point the Intrepid, being only fourteen minutes behind, and having twenty to receive from the Albertine, looked very like a winner. They had again to jibe round, and the Aline sent down her huge topsail for a more moderate piece of canvas, as they had to haul their sheets aft in order to fetch Calshot. On the way down the Intrepid seemed to stop altogether, the wind coming on stronger. The Albertine held her reach towards Calshot, after getting round the Light; but the Aline made one or two short tacks, and in the best down, either by skill in manœuvring or by superior speed to windward, she managed to get ahead, whilst the Viking came unpleasantly close to both, and the Aline rounded the Lepe boat at 5.21, about half a minute ahead of the Albertine. These three vessels had saved the slack tide down, but the unlucky Intrepid and Titania had a hard fight for it against tide, and once, if not twice, the Titania was ahead. From the mark-boat there was a fair run up with wind and tide, and they passed the winning flag:—

H. M. S.		H. M. S.		H. M. S.
Aline ..	5 36 5	Viking ..	5 41 28	Titania .. 6 11 30
Albertine	5 36 44	Intrepid ..	6 9 50

It will be seen that the Viking, having 3 min. to receive from the Albertine, lost by 1 min. 23 sec., and until the last the result was doubtful, as a little more or less wind might easily have made the difference. As it was, however, Lord Londesborough came in the winner of the Queen's Cup for 1864, after a very hard and good fight.

This was an almost perfect day for yacht-sailing—a bright sun, with a fresh wind, and very little sea; the tide also suited as well as it ever can suit a Cowes course. The appearance of Cowes Harbour and Roads when the yachts came in was as confused as in no old picture of a sea fight, the sailing yachts flying in through a fleet of near eighty yachts at anchor, and some scores of rowing boats, all crammed with people. The Prince of Wales, in the Royal steam-yacht Elfin, was a spectator of the race. When the competitors returned to Cowes the prize cup, the gift of her Majesty, was presented to Lord Londesborough. It was manufactured by Hunt and Roskell, of New Bond-street, and was designed and modelled by Mr. Archibald J. Barrett. The vase is rich in ornamentation, decorated with starfish, seaweed, and shells. It has two panels, one adorned with a group illustrating the poem by Longfellow—

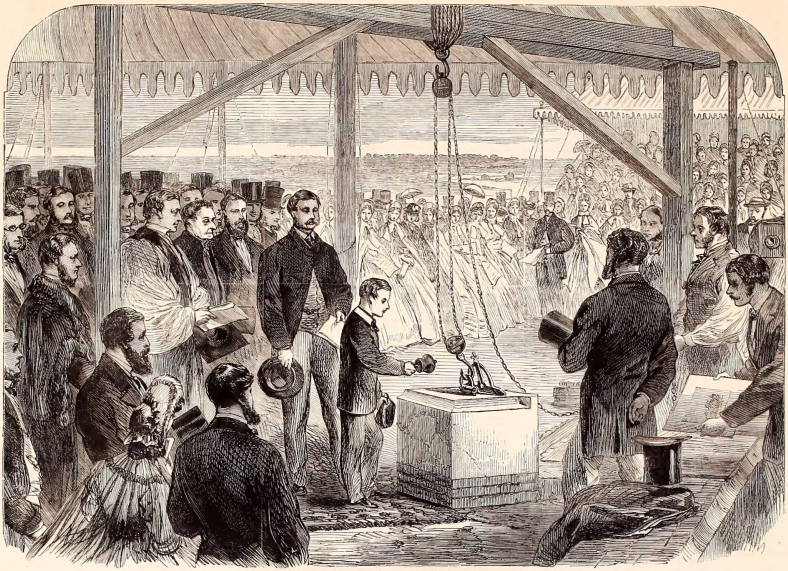
> And Alfred, King of the Saxons,
> Had a book upon his knees;
> And he wrote down the wondrous tale
> Of him who was the first to sail
> Into the Arctic Seas.
> And to the King of the Saxons,
> In witness of the truth,
> Raising his noble head
> He stretched his tawny hand and said,
> "Behold this walrus tooth!"

The other panel is composed of a group of sea-nymphs, on the cover a figure of Navigation, seagulls being introduced on the ornamented handles. On the base are silver panels, with Royal cypher inscription. The vase is placed on a stand covered with crimson velvet. Our Engraving gives a representation of the principal design.

The East Cowes town regatta took place on the same afternoon. There were rowing-matches, sailing-matches, and duck-hunts, affording great amusement to the people who crowded the beach. The Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince and Princess Louis of Hesse, the Prince and Princess of Leiningen, and their suites, remained on board the Royal yacht, in Cowes Roads, till nearly seven o'clock. At nightfall there was a grand display of fireworks, both on shore and afloat. The final piece, with the initials of the squadron, "R. Y. S.," as a centre-piece, surmounted by an Imperial crown, and surrounded by a brilliant display of fire, was very beautiful. A signal rocket was then fired from the Squadron Battery; in five minutes this was followed by the discharge of a gun, when, as if by magic, the entire fleet of yachts, steamers, and other vessels, including the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, and H.M.S. Irresistible, were brilliantly illuminated, while there was a flight of rockets from the grounds of Mr. Sheddon, at East Cowes, under the superintendence of the officers of the Victoria and Albert.

The business of Friday week was to renew the contest, which was undecided on the Wednesday, for the prize given by the Royal Yacht Squadron of 100 guineas, and 20 guineas to the second vessel, for cutters belonging to a yacht club. It was won by the Arrow, 94 tons, belonging to Mr. T. Chamberlayne; the Surf, 54 tons, Mr. G. Harrison, taking the second prize. The Queen and the Princess of Wales visited Cowes on Friday evening, and passed in front of the Royal Yacht Squadron Castle on their return to Osborne.

On Saturday the regatta was brought to a close with a match for a prize to be sailed for by yachts under 200 tons belonging to any yacht club. It was won by the Vinder, 45 tons, belonging to Mr. A. Duncan. The meeting was altogether most successful.



We may pass from the Royal Yacht Club to the new pleasure-ground on Prince's-green, where, thanks to the liberality of Mr. G. R. Stephenson, who resides at Cowes, a band of music is now heard for two hours every Monday evening, in the elegant pavilion which he has built. Our Engraving, from a photograph by Messrs. Symonds and Wheeler, represents this structure, as well as the drinking-fountain, which Mr. Stephenson has also provided.

PRINCE LEOPOLD LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF A NEW INFIRMARY AT BISHOP'S WALTHAM, HANTS.

PRINCE LEOPOLD AND THE ROYAL ALBERT INFIRMARY AT BISHOP'S WALTHAM.

THE little town of Bishop's Waltham, in Hampshire, was enlivened on Thursday week by the presence of a youthful member of the Royal family, who came, with the gracious permission of her Majesty, to lay the foundation-stone of the Royal Albert Infirmary. This institution is designed to provide for the poor of the district those comforts in times of illness, and that constant medical attendance, which can only be secured for them by an organised establishment. Bishop's Waltham is situated at the extremity of the area which is practically included in the operations of the Winchester and Southampton Hospitals, and beyond that of the Portsmouth Hospital; at any rate, for the treatment of either urgent or chronic cases. It is not contemplated to act in rivalry with, much less in opposition to, the large and beneficent institutions in operation at Winchester, Portsmouth, and Southampton. On the contrary, the infirmary at Bishop's Waltham, in addition to its own work, will probably aid those great hospitals, by relieving them of patients who are almost beyond the sphere of their operations. The large manufacturing works which are established at Bishop's Waltham afford an additional reason why an infirmary should be judiciously placed in close vicinity to this town. Her Majesty has been pleased to take the kindest interest in this institution; she has permitted it to take the name of the "Royal Albert Infirmary," and she seems to have authorised the editor of the Prince Consort's speeches and addresses—Mr. Arthur Helps, Clerk to the Privy Council, and the author of "Friends in Council"—to express her good wishes on this occasion.

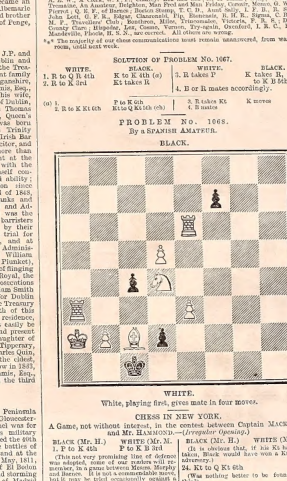
About half-past one o'clock a loud cheer from the spectators announced the arrival of their Royal Highnesses Prince Leopold and Prince Louis of Hesse, attended by Earl Granville, General Seymour, and Baron Westerweller. Their Royal Highnesses were received at the station by the chairman, the provisional committee, the treasurer, and the honorary secretary of the Royal Albert Infirmary, the steward of the festival committee, the Bishop of Winchester, the dean of Winchester, Portsmouth, and Southampton. Then, headed by the band and escorted by the 1st Hampshire (Bishop's Waltham) Rifle Volunteers, they proceeded to the place appointed for the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone. Having arrived at this spot, the procession was saluted by the guard of honour, the 3rd Administrative Battalion Hants Volunteers, and the National Anthem was sung by the choir, accompanied by the band. During the performance of the National Anthem the Prince stood facing the stone, with Earl Granville on his right and Prince Louis of Hesse on his left. He appeared to be in remarkably good health, but, as was very natural, seemed to feel this was the first public ceremony in which he took part, a little nervous and excited. The anthem having been sung, the Bishop of Winchester, as the steward of the festival committee, the Bishop of the diocese, the Dean of Winchester, the Rector of Bishop's Waltham, the Dean of Portsmouth, and Southampton, then, headed by the band and escorted by the 1st Hampshire (Bishop's Waltham) Rifle Volunteers, directly to the place appointed for the ceremony of laying the foundation-stone. Having arrived at this spot, the procession was saluted by the guard of honour, the 3rd Administrative Battalion Hants Volunteers, and the National Anthem was sung by the choir, accompanied by the band. During the performance of the National Anthem the Prince stood facing the stone, with Earl Granville on his right and Prince Louis of Hesse on his left. He appeared to be in remarkably good health, but, as was very natural, seemed to feel this was the first public ceremony in which he took part, a little nervous and excited. The anthem having been sung, the Bishop of Winchester, as the steward of the festival committee, the Bishop of the diocese, the Dean of Winchester, Portsmouth, and Southampton.



OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

ADMIRAL CATOR.

Admiral Bertie Cornelius Cator, a highly meritorious naval officer, who died on the 23rd ult., at the Palace Hotel, Bucklersham-gate, was the fourth son of Joseph Cator, Esq., an eminent merchant, by his wife Diana, sister of Admiral Sir Alexander Bertie, Bart. He entered the Royal Navy, early in life, in the spring of 1809, and obtained his lieutenancy in 1807. He acted at first under his gallant uncle, then Captain Alexander Bertie, and was employed during the capture of privateers in the Mediterranean in the Glory, Malta, and Carysfort frigates. After commanding the Goat of damp he was captured by two French frigates while in charge of the Ranger transport, on its way from the Cape of Good Hope to the Mauritius, but exchanged shortly afterwards, and was then placed in command of the Bombay Anna, the Hon. East India Company's ship, in which ship he assisted at the capture of the Isle of Bourbon in 1810. Cator commanded the Acteon on the coast of America in an attack on the enemy's barracks. He was also in Lynx Haven Bay in 1813, and participated in various other services afloat. He gained his post rank in 1814; was made a Companion of the Bath in 1815, a Vice-Admiral in 1858, and an Admiral, April 12,1862. Admiral Cator's nephew is the present Admiralty Cator, Esq., of Woodstock-dale, Berkshire, and Beckenham, Kent, and his heir is the present distinguished Lieutenant-General William Cator, C.B., of Fenge, Kent, Colonel-Commandant 11th Battalion, R.A.

MR. KEMMIS.

William Kemmis, Esq., of Ballinacor, in the county of Wicklow, J.P. and D.L., formerly Crown Solicitor for Dublin and Queen's Counties Circuit, and Solicitor to the Treasury in Ireland, died at the advanced family age of seventy-six years, at Kevan Mulloy, Glamorganshire, and was the last son of Thomas Kemmis, Esq., of Castle Coote, Queen's County, by his wife, Jane, daughter of Henry White, Esq., of Dublin. Mr. Kemmis was a cousin-uncle of the present Thomas Kemmis, Esq., of Shrule Castle, and Strasbourg, Queen's County, Justice of Peace of Rosenallis. He was born in 1788, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; he was called to the Irish Bar in 1811, and was appointed Crown Solicitor, and most efficiently filled the office for more than half a century. He sustained as agent at the memorable trials of 1798, connected with the Irish Rebellion, and those, in fact, himself connected, with great discretion, skill, and ability; every remainder Crown prosecution since till the ending of the disturbed period of 1848, and he received universally the thanks and approbation of each Attorney-General and Administration under which he acted. Mr. Kemmis was the AMERICA—NORTH AND SOUTH.

INTO that spirit of partisanship which has characterised individual feeling in this country in reference to the contest waging between the hostile States of America we have never been able to enter. In the reasons given for warmly espousing either cause we have not found enough to justify their entire adoption. It has always seemed to us a fallacy to assert that the North is contending purely for the abolition of slavery, or that the South is battling merely for liberty. It would be much nearer the truth if it were laid down that both are struggling for political ascendancy, while the South is, besides, fighting for what has always been held to be property. Something may be set down, also, for difference of race, always an important element of animosity between belligerents. But what we have ever contended for, in dealing with the American question as it exists, has been a strict impartiality, not only of action but of opinion, on the part of this country; a rigid non-interference, moral as well as physical, and a public feeling expressive only of earnest hope of a speedy cessation of a civil war unparalleled in its magnitude and terrible in its accessories. Holding these views, we conceive that we are entitled to review the position of both parties as it stood when the latest intelligence left America, and to draw deductions from that examination, without laying ourselves open to any suspicion of partiality or bias. Our first, indeed our only, wish is that the war was over; and it is mainly with reference to the realisation of that wish that we from time to time consider the relative situation of the armies opposed to each other and dwell on the details of those battles which are periodically fought with a curious similarity of circumstance and result.

Although operations are being conducted in several outlying districts, principally in the South, and we hear of movements of army corps here and there, since the siege of Charleston has practically ceased the chief interest has been concentrated on that small space which lies between Washington and Richmond. The country between the Potomac and the Rappahannock has become as familiar to the mind's eye of the English public as the space between St. Paul's and South Kensington is to the real vision of the general metropolitan population. Under whatever General—M'Clellan, Hooker, Burnside, Meade, or Grant—the ground traversed by the Federals has been nearly the same, and the object identical—the capture of the Southern capital; and the issue of each campaign, up to the last accounts, almost identical also. There has been a continuous series of assaults by the Federals on the Confederates, more or less in force, which have been, as a rule, repulsed, with a loss to the assailants of hecatombs of men, and with serious inroads on the comparatively small numerical strength of the defenders; and each army has occupied nearly its original position, although, in the earlier periods of the present operations under Grant he did manage to fight his way onwards for a distance which cost him a thousand men a mile. Now, although the general description of the condition of the opposing forces may not appear very seriously modified from that which was given weeks or even months ago, a careful examination of the state of affairs will show that a radical alteration has taken place in the position of the Southerners, and that they stand in an attitude of marked advantage. It is probably well known that there are at this moment three points towards which, as the scenes of operations, observation is especially directed—namely, Petersburg, Atlanta, and Martinsburg—on the frontier of Pennsylvania. As everyone knows, the recent attempt of Grant on Petersburg, which he has chosen to consider as an outwork of Richmond which cannot be turned but must be reduced from its importance as an obstacle to a march on the capital, has signally failed; that he has been repulsed with severe loss, confessedly severe; and that it is supposed that he will have to retire and throw himself into Washington, unable to arrest the threatened advance of the Confederates. Hitherto the Federals have obtained advantages at Atlanta, and the object of the operations at that point were believed to be close upon being attained. But here, too, the Confederates have recovered themselves, and hold the Northern General in check. From Martinsburg the Confederates have come to another raid into Maryland. It is asserted that the movements at each of these places are founded on a concerted plan; that they are based on a certain combination; and that the strategy on which they were founded is now bringing forth its legitimate fruits. No one has ever seriously questioned the bravery or the resolution of the North; but the gigantic efforts which that party has made, the steady draught which has been made on the resources that it possesses—which have been proved to be so vast, and which are used as if they were actually illimitable, and the obstinacy it has displayed, a quality of which General Grant is now the type and the personification—have in this, the fourth year of the war, left the Federals in a situation not only far from successful, but of positive disadvantage, to say no more. When the South undertook what they conceived to be the duty of defending by arms their right to secession, they were conscious of all the hardships and dangers which awaited them; they accepted all the troubles and responsibilities incident to the enterprise, and they have held their own and worked their way with a firmness and persistency undaunted by past losses or future perils. The Federals, not without reason, assumed that they must win by mere force of numbers and amplitude of resources; they took their success for granted; and in some self-complacent way or other they have declined to recognise the fact that they have not been engaged in a series of triumphal marches through the country of a flying enemy. Indeed, just now the probability of a change in the character of the war, by which the Confederates will cease to be on the defensive and become the aggressors, is much discussed. For our own parts, we believe that, independently of military reasons, the advantages of such a change upon Washington will be considered as a question of policy. The raids into some of the Federal States are purely military operations, having for their objects the distraction of the enemy and the obtaining of supplies, and are, in fact, temporary in their character. But an advance by three or four into the territory of the North, with the ostensible purpose of a march upon the capital of that which was the Union, would be productive, as we think, of exactly opposite results to those which persons who look at the question from a Southern point of view would anticipate. It would create such a panic in the North as to bring about a popular demand for the abrupt closing of the war on any terms, but it would be much more likely to bring about a really national concentration of the Federal strength; it would tend to change the character of the armies of the North, which would no more enrol in its ranks men like those who constitute the military strength of the South—men of the country, ready to fight for the country—instead of the Irishmen, Germans, and negroes, who are thought good enough for food for powder in a crusade against Lee in Virginia. In short, the quarrel would have a new point of departure and would become more intensified, more real, more actually a quarrel between the populations of North and South than now, when it is hardly more than one between a party in the North, of which Mr. Lincoln is the representative, and the people proper of the South.

The situation, we conceive, is one which, if for a moment good sense and good feeling could come into play between the contending parties, might be turned to advantage. If the Federals could be brought to admit that the Confederate position is impregnable, that all has been done which military and national honour require for victory, they might, without derogation, consent to a compromise in the interests of humanity and peace. It is quite clear that if the war is to go on it cannot be conducted by the Federals on a smaller scale than hitherto; for, vast as have been the forces employed, owing to the peculiar nature of the country which has to be invaded they have never been sufficient to carry out the only strategy which could have been successful. If hostilities continue, the war must resolve itself into one of extermination. A time must come when men must be wanting to carry on so sanguinary a contest—nay, a time must come when the means of obtaining men and matériel must fail; and the moment of exhaustion is not that when negotiation can be carried on upon terms consistent either with mutual fairness or mutual dignity. As we have said, we think the present juncture one when the voice of reason, of humanity, and of peace might be raised effectually with the object of putting an end to a struggle such as the world never yet saw, and which, whatever may be its issue, generations yet to come will have to deplore.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Napoleon fête was celebrated by the Parisians on Monday with great rejoicings. The presence of the Emperor, the Empress, and the Prince Imperial contributed materially to the interest of the scene. Wherever they appeared they were cordially, if not enthusiastically, cheered. At night the illuminations were splendid, and the concourse was numerous.

According to despatches and letters received from the departments, the national fête was celebrated throughout the whole of France with the greatest enthusiasm.

The King Consort of Spain arrived at St. Cloud on Tuesday evening. The Emperor awaited his Majesty at the entrance of the park. A great reception afterwards took place. In consequence of his visit the public rejoicings will be continued throughout the week.

On the occasion of the fête, their Majesties received at the Tuileries the respects of the Princess Mathilde, of the princes and princesses of the family of the Emperor having rank at Court, and of those not having this rank; the ministers and members of Privy Councils, the marshals and admirals, the senators, the Paris, the grand officers of the Crown, and other officials also presented their respects to their Majesties. A mass was, followed by a "Te Deum," was celebrated at the chapel of the Tuileries in presence of their Majesties, the members of the Imperial family, the superior officers of State, and the Court.

An Imperial decree published on Monday adds 50f. (£2) to the salaries of all employés who are unmarried and of sixty years old.

M. Behic, the Minister of Finance; M. Stourm; M. Forcade de la Roquette, Councillor of State; M. Voitry, the President of the Bank, and Count Daru, have been appointed Officers of the Legion of Honour; and M. Duruy, the Minister of Public Instruction; MM. Emile Perrin and Thalès to be Commanders of the same order.

His Majesty, on the occasion of the fête, has granted pardons, commutations, or reductions of punishment to 1517 condemned prisoners of different categories. Most of them are released in the prisons, and in the penitentiary colonies of Guiana, and other places of confinement. A few commutations are to be transported. Only a small number of those establishments as having acquired claims to obtain by their submission and repentance. Sixty-three national guards of the department of the Seine, who had been condemned for breach of discipline, have been relieved from their punishment.

The distribution of prizes accorded by the Fine Art Jury took place last Saturday afternoon in the Salon Carré of the Louvre. Marshal Vaillant, Minister of the Imperial Household, and the Chief of the Ministers, in the persons of Fine-art Academician Inspectors, mustered numerously around him. Count de Nieuwerkerke, the Superintendent of Fine Arts, M. Perrin, Director, his secretary, Baron Taylor, prominent part in the proceedings. Marshal Vaillant, Art-Minister, read a long discourse. In it the Emperor's intention to grant, every five years, the cross of the civil list, a grand prize for what a jury of thirty—ten of whom shall be nominated by the Fine-Art Academy—shall adjudicate the best work, either in painting, sculpture, or architecture. The first prize will be worth 100,000f. (£4000).

The Emperor and the Empress have contributed 10,000f. (£400) towards the erection of a work on Assyrian antiquities.

SPAIN.

The Northern of Spain Railway was opened on Monday by King Francisco de Assisi. A handsome station, at which his Majesty presided, supported by some of the great officers of State. San Sebastian welcomed his royal visitor with enthusiasm.

The King Consort then left for Bordeaux, where he was received with due ceremony by the city authorities. Next morning he started for Paris.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

King Christian has issued a proclamation to his army explaining the causes which forced him to conclude a peace. He admits the heavy sacrifices imposed on the country to secure that peace. He declares himself well aware that the army was ready for the struggle, but the final result did not depend on Denmark; and during the contest a considerable part of the country which is in the power of the enemy would have had to support an oppression which would have led to its ruin. Therefore, he felt obliged to put an end to the war even by the cession of a part of the territory which from time immemorial had belonged to Denmark. All his hopes of assistance, he declares, have been deceived, and he has nothing left but to submit, therefore, given them the victory. The proclamation, which concludes with a promise from the King to the bravery and devotion of the army, is not countersigned by any Minister.

The question respecting the future position and government of the Duchies under the Danish monarch is likely to give rise to controversy. The sudden occupation of Lauenburg by the Federal troops is only one indication of the feeling which prevails among the minor German States at the supposed ambitious designs of Prussia. The Hanoverian Government, having been questioned by Prussia on this matter, has proclaimed its previous hostility to the movement, and declared itself equally supressed with Prussia at the news that such a step had been taken. Even the Saxon Government, it would appear, has instructions which led to the occupation.

The Nordd. Allg. Zeitung official paper confirmed a statement already made that Saxony is about to propose in the Diet that an explanation should be demanded of Austria and Prussia as to the future revision of the Treaty of Vienna, accession of rights (over the duchies) to which he himself had no title; and this intended proposal to the Prussian deputies has an insult to the victors.

The Prussians during the armistice still exercise the rights of masters of Jutland. They have seized a fleet preventing the exportation of horses, horned cattle, pigs, bacon, and grain.

The King of Prussia has, it is stated, ordered the erection of a column to commemorate the campaign of Schleswig. It will be formed of the cannon and muskets taken from the Danes, which will be re-cast for the purpose. The place fixed on for the column is the large court of the Hôtel des Invalides at Berlin.

A division of the Prussian flotilla, under the command of Captain Jachmann, is making a trial-trip in the Schleswig waters of the Baltic. It will touch at Eckernförde and Flensburg.

The Prussians are not slow in availing themselves of the magnificent harbour of Kiel to convert it into a station for what at present may be termed their cruising navy. Two corvettes and a division of gunboats have been ordered there, and two officers of high rank in the Ministry of Marine have been engaged in an inspection of the port.

AMERICA.

General Grant has sustained a severe repulse at Petersburg. The North estimate their entire losses in the nearly 6000 in killed, wounded, and captured.

Grant had conceived the idea of undermining a fort which was considered the key of the Confederate intrenchments. The works were begun on the 28th of June, under the direction of Colonel Pleasants, a Pennsylvanian engineer of repute; and on the 28th of July all was ready. A tunnel 500 ft. in length, 5½ ft. in height, and 4 ft. in width at the bottom, had been driven. The end of the tunnel was charged with six tons of gunpowder. When the work was finished, Grant, in order to distract the attention of the enemy, transferred a portion of his army (as stated in our last Number) to the north side of the James River, but on the 29th of July they returned. Early in the morning of Saturday, the 30th, the mine was exploded, and the fort, shattered into fragments, rose high into the air and came down in a shower of ruins. Simultaneously with the blowing up of a body of South Carolina troops, in the wreck. Hereupon a strong body of Federal troops advanced, carried over a tremendous fire from their own artillery, and captured the mined earthwork and part of the first line of the intrenchments. To support this force and to seize the inner lines, two columns of negro troops, under General Burnside, were pushed on. But the attempt was vain. The inner line of works commanded the outer, and the assailants were crushed with a storm of shot and shell. Presently the Confederates, having taken shelter of their intrenchments, charged down upon the enemy, and the negro troops broke and fled, a demoralised mob, to the rear: their officers, who strove in vain to rally them, being nearly all cut off. The Confederates were with irresistible fury and charged the white troops as successfully as they had charged the black. The loss inflicted was terrible. General Bartlett, with his whole Staff, and about 1500 Federal soldiers, were made prisoners. At last the Federals succeeded in rallying their own defences. It is stated that the Federals, in their first rush, after the explosion of the mine, took four hundred prisoners. Excepting this and the men killed in the fort, the South does not seem to have suffered any serious loss. On the 31st ult. President Lincoln went to Fort Monroe, and had an interview with Grant. On the 2nd inst. the Federal dead were buried, a short truce having been made for that purpose. Rumours are rife that Grant is about to be transferred to Washington: there is no sort of evidence that he is about to relinquish the command of the army of the South side of the James River.

The Confederates have now come into Maryland in force, and occupied Hagerstown. There is no definite information, however, as to their movements. A small body of their cavalry, under General Bartlett, with his whole Staff, and about 1500 Federal soldiers, were made prisoners. At last the Federals have

The normal tranquillity has been disturbed by two unexpected events—the death of a man not great, but good, and in his generation most useful; and an attempted outrage, sensational enough for the most sensational of our popular novelists. On Sunday last died the President of the Board of Land and Works, Richard Hoales, a man who, about twenty years ago, came out as a journeyman coachmaker, and rose, by sheer hard work, sobriety, and honesty, to about as high a position as any man can aspire to out here, where the highest is but a few steps above the mass. He was sensible, while scarcely clever, and honest among a population with whom honesty in successful men is by no means an invariable characteristic. He popped somehow into much, and the immense cortège which followed his remains on Thursday last, and the very proper observance of the many honours who crowded the line of the procession, would have been a credit to any country. The attempted crime was something more out of the way than the premature decease of an old and respectable man. In broad daylight, at half-past ten a.m., four men, armed with pistols and daggers, sauntered into the banking-establishment of the Oriental and Scottish Chartered Bank at Ekrorey, one of our most crowded suburbs, and were proceeding to plunder the counters. The astonished officials—three in number, there happening to be no customers within—sprang upon them. Three of the lot decamped, section the better part of valour; and the fourth, who remained, got a fourth sword, fought, stabbed, and shot, but yielded, after a protracted struggle, to the joint eloquence of three pairs of commercial fists and the scientific and vigorous application of a brass candlestick to his occiput. His mates were captured the same day; and the generally exceeding orderly city has already begun to forget the affair. Meantime the incident has by no means abated the wrath of the colonists against the transportation question. Here is the first interesting captives being all of that virtuous class of criminals—expirees or ticket-of-leave men—whom, as you cannot manage in England, it is wished that we should receive from you. The chief comfort we feel is, that the adventurers were so rapidly disposed of; and we crow not a little at the contrast with the case of the people of New South Wales, towards whom the Victorians—who, by-the-by, except the boys and the girls, are nearly all Scotch, and Edinburgh at the last the most—feel about as amicable as the Dutch to the Flemings or the Spanish to the Portuguese, disliking them most because they are so abominably alike.

A flood of light has been let in on the working of the convict-system in Western Australia through the columns of the local newspaper, the proprietors of which sent a special correspondent to the colony to report upon the system. His letters have appeared in the Argus, and to-day they are republished in a pamphlet for circulation in England.

About eighteen months ago a well-educated scoundrel, named Crouch—glorying in both Rev. and M.A., attached to his name—arrived here, and, after various failures, took a house. A certain friendship he secured through forged letters of introduction, was finally caught forging an acceptance, and tried and convicted of the crime. A few days ago he was let loose upon us with a ticket of exemption, and resumed his old practices. Plausible to a degree, highly educated, and anything but repulsive, by the use of means well known to the world of literature, art, and fashion, he has again succeeded in imposing upon some of our citizens. He was tried and convicted as Crouch, but he recommenced his career as Cursiter, representing himself as a member of the city of London Gurgoyle. He exhibited testimonials signed by Tennyson, Dickens, Layard, and a host of lesser celebrities—and by other names great in art and theology. As it appears the man is not unknown in London, either as Crouch, Gurney, or Merton, I mention the matter.

The saloon even have developed themselves into strong, healthy, active young fishes, apparently quite at home in their element in their artificial home as if they were in their native rivers. The question now naturally occurs—Is it not possible that the success of the fish in Gipps's Land which have their rise in regions of perpetual snow, and whose temperature, even in summer, never rises above 50 deg. or 52 deg. To one of these probably the most interesting letters will be shortly consigned. Mr. Wilson and the other gentlemen who so much interested themselves in this fishing experiment are, of course, highly delighted at the complete success of their efforts.

On Tuesday nearly 500 children of the northern schools of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, accompanied by the Rev. R. S. Barker, M.A., and day school teachers, and other friends, started by the Charing-cross Railway for Hawsker Park, Scarborough, for their annual treat. A substantial dinner was provided by the liberality of the parishioners, and the children were amused by swings, swings, and various amusements during the day. In the evening they were further amused by the ascent of a fire-balloon and a display of fireworks. About 150 adults, friends of the children, were also to be taken into the country, received a treat suitable to their age in the school-room.

As the "City express" from Camden Town station, on the North London Railway, was about to start on Saturday morning, the driver of the engine burst. The engine was lifted off the rails, swung against the parapet of the bridge spanning Camden-street, upon which it was partly arrested, and thrown into the street below. Fortunately for the passengers the carriages remained hanging, and on the carriages being detached from the driver, Ellis, was found on the down line, severely, though not dangerously, hurt. The stoker, Franklin, was thrown from the line, and he was very seriously injured and scalded. He has since died.

The week ending with the 1862 children—1014 boys and 948 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1856-62 the average number (corrected) was 1932. The weekly return shows a manifest improvement in the state of London in this respect as compared with the two previous weeks. The deaths, which were 1607 and 1597 registered last Saturday, rose to 1676 on Saturday, the 6th inst., after which number they declined. The average number of deaths in the thirty-one weeks of the present quarter was 1,000. The deaths registered in the 8 registration districts of London, in comparison with the 10 previous weeks, show a decrease in the number of deaths in the 10 weeks of 1,000. In these 10 weeks, in these 8 districts from 266 to 225. Besides the 226 from diarrhœa last week there were 2 registered from cholera, which occurred to adults.

The first case under the new Street Music Act was heard in the Marylebone Police Court on Thursday week. A gentleman residing in Gloucester-street, Queen's-gate, complained that an Italian, who was brought up in custody, persisted in playing his organ when he was required to go away. The complainant said that he had given the man into custody in consequence of a letter he was writing to his landlord, and, although he waved his hand to the person to go, he would not leave until he had descended into the street and spoken to him. Mr. Yardley was of opinion that the delay was occasioned by the defendant's ignorance of the English grammar mood, and dismissed the summons.

A distressing death from eating phosphorus, placed as a poison for rats, has taken place in Bermondsey. The victim was a boy of four years, son of a warehouseman. The father put phosphorus into a breakfast-butter, and had it capable taken to place in the children's bed-room on a shelf from which they were accustomed to take bread-and-butter. In the night he heard loud screams proceeding from the children. He found his two children—George, aged five years, and Thomas, aged four years—in bed. They were in a great state of fright, and the mouth of George was coming from the mouth of Thomas, who seemed in dreadful agony. Dr. Dyer was sent for, and he found that Thomas had vomited, but without avail. All the poisoned bread-and-butter left on the shelf was gone. The matter left in the stomach of Thomas had covered his night-clothes, and he was standing in the middle of a mass of blue fire. The whole of the bed was also a mass of blue fire. Dr. Lankester's verdict was "Accidental death," several censured the parents of the child for their gross carelessness.

Having been down some days before, he complained that he felt unwell, and was but two minutes in pulling him up; when he got to the surface his face, ears, nostrils, and the bulbous part of the eyes bled profusely. He was taken to the inclusive strangle, and died just before he was got on board. The Edinburgh Courant gives the following particulars of Mr. Gladstone's visit to Mr. Stuart's estate, Tarradale, in the north, last week. She lived for many years in a large house above, without a servant, having scarcely any intercourse with those around her. A few days ago, however, she was found to be unwell. Some of the neigh bours visited her, and, seeing her condition, they sent for a doctor. He found her ill of the parish. She continued to sink fast. A search being made for her will, two copies of equal validity were found, executed, amounting to the following seventeen sovereigns; and with these a cheque for £500. Other documents turned up that raised £600 more to the above. Besides the £1700 in cash, she had property of considerable value, which will show her to have been worth more than £3000. A quantity of good clothing was found carefully laid up beside her. The whole has been left to a first cousin. The deceased was seventy-two years of age.

Clement, surgeon, of Shrewsbury, by a subscription among a large number of the inhabitants of Shropshire and adjoining counties, where Mr. Clement is highly esteemed, not only for his professional skill, but for his zealous furtherance of many of the most valuable institutions of the city. It consisted of a large table ornament, in silver gilt, made by Messrs. Smith and Nicholson, of Duke-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields. It contains a fountain, worked by some newly-patented machinery, to play for two hours and a half. At the top is a figure of Esculapius, and one of the sons in a group representing Benevolence holding a sick child in her lap, with Dr. Clement attending to the child on the other side of her. The ceremony attended by several boys, who bear the emblems of the majoralty of Shrewsbury—namely, the mace, sword, and cap of state. The whole rests upon a massive oval plateau, silvered with four smaller figures and with various devices of local scenery, and having the shields for devices or flowers attached to its margin.

A numerously-attended meeting of county magistrates was held at the Shirehall, Warwick, on Saturday, convened by the Lord-lieutenant, Lord Leigh, for the purpose of taking into consideration the proposal for making Hampton-in-Arden a county town. Lord Leigh said he had convened the meeting in pursuance of a request from Sir G. Grey that he should lay the matter before the county for the purpose of forward their views to the Government. After the hon. secretary, Mr. Bickley, Chairman of Quarter Sessions, setting forth that the population of Hampton-in-Arden was 4,000, that it was fifteen miles, and consequently 1000 days' journey from Warwick. The police force more than one half of the civil and criminal cases from Hampton-in-Arden had to be tried at Warwick, where was now every accommodation required for Bar, witnesses, and solicitors. The expense to the county would be no increase expense to the county, as the business of twenty miles to a county town. The petition also stated that the Corporation of Warwick would provide handsome and convenient lodgings for the Judges and maintain the same in an appropriate manner. After a long discussion it was resolved to forward a copy of the petition to Sir G. Grey unfavourable to the proposal.

During the last few days (says the Manchester Guardian) there have been, under somewhat singular circumstances, a succession of "finds," at the corner of Hanging Ditch, in the old part of the town, principally of the reign of Henry III. The extent of the deposit may be gathered from the fact that the workmen employed in the new coins found upwards of 200 pieces, having an aggregate weight of about 21 lb. avoirdupois. A new junction road is being made from Victoria-street to Cross-street. The whole was open as the new side of the ancient residence known as Manks' Hall, where it is supposed the mint of Archbishop Gray, who was founder of the hall, and the greater part of Eccles, Monton, and Swinton, had a grange, or farm residence, with offices, &c., and where the tithes were stored by the tenants and other inhabitants of the neighbourhood. Here the discovery was made by the workmen, Thomas Bricks, who, as soon as he saw one picked up a few coins at the wall, and thought so little of the discovery that he gave some away to his companions. He afterwards, however, and was brought into communication with Mr. Allen Gibb, a local antiquary, under whose direction the workmen have since proceeded. The discovery, however, was disinterred on Friday morning last.

The thirty-fourth meeting of the British Association will commence at Bath on Wednesday, Sept. 14, under the presidency of C. Lyell, Bart. The local arrangements are in the hands of a body that have every reason to expect a large attendance. Numerous invitations have been issued to non-resident members and distinguished foreign savans. The chief railways have consented to convey members and associates at a single fare for the double journey. The sections are arranged as follows:—Mathematical and physical science, at the Blue Coat School. B. Chemical science, at the Guildhall. Geology, at the Mineral Water Hospital. Zoology, at the Guildhall. D. Zoology and botany, in the west wing of the General Hospital, and in the Pump-room. F. Geography and ethnology, in the same building. G. Economic science and statistics, in the Mineral Water Hospital. H. Mechanical science and engineering, and the Graminar School. After Sept. 9 personal applications for tickets must be made at the Mayor's Office, Guildhall, Bath, which will be open daily after Monday, Sept. 12. On Friday, Sept. 16, at 8.30, Professor Rosse will deliver a lecture at the Royal Literary and Scientific Institution. On the following Saturday, Sept. 19, at the same place, Dr. Livingstone will give some account of his explorations of the Zambesi and its tributaries, and will exhibit a few curiosities at the rooms on Thursday, Sept. 15; and a microscopical soirée on Tuesday evening, Sept. 20, at 8.30. Other scientific interest will take place on Saturday, Sept. 17, and Thursday, Sept. 22.

During the excavations in Hot Bath-street for the new wing of the Bath United Hospital, the foundations of a large Roman building were discovered. These foundations (says the Bath Chronicle) are of massive strength, and the whole building to which they belonged must have been one of some importance. The base of a pillar, turned upside down, and used as a foundation formation, was found, and appears to have formed part of even an older structure. Last week a further discovery was made in the north-east corner of the site of the house inside the old line of circumvallation of Mr. William Foote, Lower Borough-walls. This discovery consists of a large portion of a tessellated pavement. The pavement is in compartments, and have formed the flooring of a room about 12 ft. square, and rests upon pillars and hollow tiles. The pavement has been used for heating purposes. The design of the pavement differs from any found in Bath before, in the centre is a rose, which is surrounded by a wreath, and other ornamental devices. Enough of the pavement remains to enable an accurate sketch of its design to be made. The foundations of the walls of the room in question was built upon this hollow Roman floor, and the pavement is in consequence much crushed and broken. It is the first time that a pavement has been found larger in situ, adjoins this first one, and appears to have been the floor of a room of the same size as the one first discovered. Tracings of the pavement are being taken, and the interesting remains will be preserved with jealous care. Some fragments of pottery and coins have also been found in the course of the excavations.

LAW.—At the Liverpool Assizes on Saturday last two merchants and ship-store dealers, named Jones and Highatt, were tried before the Lord Chief Justice on a charge of having stolen a quantity of rope on board the Confederate steamer Georgia, which, when in this country, was named the Japan. The evidence was wholly circumstantial, and although it is a point of law was raised to the effect that the enlistment took place at Brest, and is not within the jurisdiction of this country. The Lord Chief Justice overruled the objection, but consented to reserve it for appeal. The prisoners were found guilty, an sentenced to twelve months' hard labour in the house of correction.

A case of some interest to the classes who get up and invest in public commercial undertakings was tried in the Court of Exchequer, Dublin, during last week. The plaintiff, Mr. Bale, a gentleman living at Newcastle, county Dublin, sued the defendant for the non-delivery of shares. Company (Limited) to recover a sum of upwards of £2000, which he had invested in shares of the above-named undertaking. The defendant set up pleas of the false and fraudulent representations to the effect that the company was prosperous, whereas it was wholly unsuccessful. A great deal of evidence was taken, and the result was that an arrangement was come to by which the damages of £2000 were reduced to £1000, and the plaintiff to retain the amount paid and claimed by him.

The Liverpool papers contain a narrative of fearful sufferings endured by the passengers and crew of a Liverpool vessel, the All Serene, that was captured in a gale on her voyage from the Seashell Islands to Sydney. Most of those on board took refuge in the chains, where they managed to make a raft or punt, to which they committed themselves, and for eight days endured terrible sufferings on the open ocean, men dying every day from want and disease. The survivors landed at the Seashell Islands on the 30th of June.

THE RHINE.

THE very name of "the Rhine" has a magic sound, expressive of all that is lovely and romantic. It is, par excellence, the river of Europe, along whose banks are gathered the most cherished traditions of the past and no little of our apprehensions for the future. Like a monarch among waters, it speeds on its way to the ocean through a proud line of feudal towers and vine-clad mountains, enriched by its multitude of tributary streams. Rising in the Grisons, in the midst of the Alpine barrier that separates Italy from the colder skies and hardier civilisation of the Swiss and German lands, the Rhine, small at first and struggling in a few feeble rills from rock and glacier, proceeds as if unconscious of its coming destiny, till, at Coire, it is received into the family of rivers, and fairly sets forth to make a way and a name for itself in the world. From this point it seems to become aware of its importance, and thrusts its way into the fair company of the Lake of Constance, whence it emerges and passes on with undiminished strength till it meets with its first great fall at Schaffhausen. But, nothing daunted by such obstacles, it pursues its course to Bâle, and soon leaves its native Switzerland to tantalize with its waters the adjacent empire of France. The left shore of the Rhine is still called Frankenland by the bostmen. It is, however, and must still be, a German river. The most phlegmatic German is warmed into enthusiasm by its name, which has ere now been the watchword that has nerved the patriot heart to do or die. Witness that glorious New-Year's night of 1814, when the army which had just effected the liberation of their country came in sight of this, the ancient landmark of their race, and knelt down and shouted "The Rhine! the Rhine!"

But for tourists, who come to enjoy the beauties of its scenery, the Rhine practically means that part of the river which lies between Cologne and Mayence. Not only is it here most picturesque, but every ruined tower, island, and rock has its history and legend, and every mile of either shore had a name and importance in the days of old. The simple peasant still believes that the shades of unquiet emperors, faithless knights, and lovelorn maidens flit through the ruined corridors of the deserted castles, or glide noiselessly across the river at nightfall to visit the scenes of their sorrows or their crimes. It may be that the rude influx of English, French, and Americans, which each summer and autumn brings to these enchanted regions, will disturb the spirits from their haunts and send them to some other spots of earth. For the utilitarianism of the present age has invaded the Rhine, and rattles through its enchanted scenery, as though it had no time for beauty. The steam-boat, hardly less a foe to the picturesque than the railroad, is even now waiting at Cologne to convey us up the Rhine. And we are nothing loth to depart; for not all the waters of all the Farinas (and they abound like Smiths in England) can neutralise "the two-and-seventy well-defined "stenches of Cologne, which owe nothing to the imagination of Coleridge.

At first the country is very flat, and presents nothing more picturesque than a few windmills, which hardly relieve the monotony of the view. Our feeling is one of profound disappointment, and we are tempted to murmur, and to ask whether the Thames at the Isle of Dogs is not, after all, as interesting as the much-vaunted Rhine. This dulness, however, is not an unfitting prelude to the coming glories of the river. A few miles above Bonn we see on our right, as we pass up the stream, the wild crag and ruin of the Drachenfels, conspicuous among the Siebengebirge (Seven Mountains), and standing, with its opposite neighbour, Rolandseck, like two giant sentinels to guard the entrance into fairyland. If we could rein in our impatience and pause awhile at Bonn before exploring the beauties of the Rhine, we should find much to interest, though little to charm the eye. Not to mention that Bonn is the seat of a world-renowned University, in which the late Prince Consort was once a diligent student, it is either the birth-place or burial-place of many of the most illustrious men of Germany. Here, amid so many remains of Roman art and arms, Niebuhr occupied a professor's chair, and here he and Schlegel are buried. Here, too, Beethoven first saw the light, in a house which is still shown, and which towers high above all the others in the dingy street, like one of his own notes above the ledger-line.

We are now again upon the river, looking up at the Drachenfels and thinking that it is weird-like enough for the story of Siegfried and the Dragon to be true after all. Dragon stories are all alike, from that of Apollo and the Python to that of our own St. George. More tragical and tender is the legend connected with the opposite crag of Rolandseck, with its one ruined arch on its summit. Doubtless it is but the remains of one of the castles belonging to the free-booters of the Rhine, who levied black mail on all the unlucky merchant-craft that passed that way. Ecke is German for an angle or corner, and is applied to several of the castles which were built at the bends of the river to enable their owners to keep a good look out for travellers. This was Roland's Ecke, and here, doubtless, like a vulture, he perched himself, ready to swoop down upon his prey. But time, like charity, covers a multitude of sins, and throws a halo of romance around many things which, seen according to modern lights, would bear very ugly names. Roland the robber-chief has been toned down under the softening touches of the past into the chivalrous lover of the beauteous Hildegunde, daughter of the Lord of Drachenburg. Called as a paladin of Charlemagne to do battle in Spain, he was reported to have fallen at Roncesvalles. Hildegunde, disconsolate at his loss, retired to a convent in the island of Nonnenwerth, which lies in the midst of the Rhine. But, like a true sensation hero, Roland was "not dead yet." He had only been wounded and left for dead. He recovered, and returned to find his fair one the bride of the Church and dead to the world. He at once built the castle, of which only a solitary fragment remains, on the top of the rock that looks down upon Nonnenwerth, that he might thence catch an occasional glimpse of his beloved Hildegunde. Loving, watching, and praying, this faithful knight continued, and, with his eyes still fixed upon the spot that contained all that was dear to him on earth, he died upon his knees.

Passing up the river, we come to another of these rocks jutting out into an angle, and surmounted by a ruin and a modern building, called Rheineck, of which we give an Engraving. The square tower is all that remains of the ancient castle, which was destroyed by fire in 1785. The new Schloss was built, in 1837, after the designs of Lassaulx for Professor Bethman-Hollweg, of Bonn. The view from the gardens is said to be very beautiful and extensive, and proves the wisdom of the robber-baron of Rheineck in selecting this spot whence to watch for the approach of a foe or a victim along the Rhine. Passing on for a few miles, we arrive at the ancient and interesting town of Andernach, whose old watch tower and church with four turrets are conspicuous objects from the river, which winds at this point, and is full of picturesque beauty. Opposite to Neuwied is an obelisk in honour of the French General Hoche, who here threw a military bridge across the Rhine, in 1798, over which he led his army in the face of the Austrians. It is not a little singular that Cæsar, in his war with the Sicambri, crossed at the same spot. His description of the singular bridge he constructed for this purpose is well known to scholars as the "tough bit" of Cæsar, from the technical words which he uses. Neuwied, at the confluence of the Wied and the Rhine, appears to be peopled by a happy family of all religions, amongst whom the odium theologicum is unknown. Here Jews and Christians, Catholics and Protestants, Moravians, Quakers, and Anabaptists are said to live in "great harmony." The principal products of this place, Neuwied, are chicory, tinware, starch, and boarding-schools. Neuwied may owe its primitive innocence to the fact that the Rhine scenery is here comparatively flat, and that the neighbourhood has, therefore, not been contaminated either by lawless chieftain or uncanny sprite. From this point to Coblenz there is nothing of especial interest, until the heights of Ehrenbreitstein rise upon our left hand as a fit opening to the second canto of Nature's Rhine-poem. We stop at Coblenz to see the view from Ehrenbreitstein. Crossing the bridge of boats about an hour before sunset, we obtain our tickets at the entrance of the fortress and proceed up the broad carriage-way to gain the height upon which this Gibraltar of the Rhine is situated. We pass over bridge and through portal, meeting on the way many a group of Prussian infantry, armed with the heavy-looking needle-gun, and wearing helmets surmounted with a sharp spike—a hideous but rare system had been introduced among the infantry, and they were expected to bait at, ten, and pass the sentries on guard. Yet in spite of all they seem, and perhaps are; but art has supplied any deficiency in this respect by furnishing them with a weapon which gives them an immense advantage over the heaviest and most active troops in the world. But whilst thinking of these things we are at the summit and gazing over the panorama upon the scene beneath. Most people have seen Turner's view of Ehrenbreitstein, and as they have looked upon the magnificent scene have imagined that the poet-artist has seen it as no other men see, and has raised from the commonplace accidents of river, city, and landscape an enchanted scene of more than earthly beauty. Yet it is not so. Nature is here more lovely than the most perfect art. There may be, and are, grander and more majestic scenes; yet we may search the world through, and even more delight upon the Swiss or Italian lake, or upon the Alpine valleys flashing with the light or whispering with the sound of many waterfalls; but the view at the city of Coblenz, posed as it purposely for the best artistic effect where the Rhine is most beautiful, and the blue Moselle joins with equal majesty to swell this scene, as it may be, bathed in a glorious sunset and softened into distance by the thin haze arising from the exhalations of the river and the fading light, forms a panorama that lingers on the memory like a thing of beauty—a joy for ever!

To the left of Coblenz, as we look down from Ehrenbreitstein, is the Hill of the Chartreuse. On this are built Forts Alexander and Constantine, which form part of the system of fortifications connected with Ehrenbreitstein. A few miles beyond is the magnificent Castle of Stolzenfels, where the late King of Prussia entertained Queen Victoria in 1845. It is a noble mediæval structure, in keeping, combining and picturesque position, and conspicuous for its grandeur where all is grand. On the opposite side of the river is the small town of Braubach, above which, on a high rock, stands the huge Castle of Marksburg, which, unlike the other castles on the Rhine, has escaped the ravages of time and the French, who left the ruinhes of all that picturesque ruins in Europe. It still stands a perfect specimen of the feudal fortresses of the Middle Ages; and its deep dungeons, secret passages, and mysterious staircases could doubtless tell many a tale of the paternal government that existed in the good old times. Marksburg was used as a prison some years ago, and in 1848 it was in possession of a difference with his Parliament, adopted the highly-constitutional plan of shutting them up in this dreary stronghold until they changed their opinions.

At this point the river makes a considerable curve, and, as in several other parts, becomes continually inclosed in mountains like a series of beautiful lakes—the smallest and most pleasing of which is just before arriving at the old Roman town of Bingen. The remarkable object at the back of this town is the water-cure establishment of Marienberg—a mode of therapeutics, invented and successfully practised by the Germans. Some distance further up, and on the opposite side to Salzig, rise the ruined castles of Sternberg and Liebeneck, called the Brothers, from a legend which relates that Conrad and Heinrich, the two sons of the Knight of Liebenstein, fell in love with the same lady, the beautiful Hildegarde. Heinrich generously or prudently resigned her to Conrad, and went to the Crusades. The father directed Sternberg to be built for the reception of Conrad and his bride. But the death of the Emperor, however, caused the marriage to be postponed for a year, during which Conrad changed his mind, and went off, like his brother, to the Crusades. Hildegarde, far from rejoicing at her lucky escape, still fretted for Conrad and believed that he would return. This is the time he did, but married to "another." Hildegarde then inconsolable. Heinrich returns, hears of his brother's perfidy, and challenges him to mortal combat. At the critical moment Hildegarde interposes, the brothers are reconciled; she retires to a convent; the faithless Conrad is punished by the desertion of his wife—he survives the shock—he is himself again—the brothers swear eternal friendship, and live and die in peace at Liebeneich; though why Heinrich did not marry Hildegarde the legend does not say.

Before reaching the well-known town of St. Goar the eye is attracted by the enormous ruins of Rheinfels, which was once the strongest fortress on the Rhine, and even in its decay tells eloquently of the greatness that "perished long ago." It was, of course, blown up by the French in 1794. If Fatherland keeps up this fine amount, there is a tolerable debt for ruined castles and general destructiveness outstanding against the French Nation. Immediately in front of St. Goar, and forming a triangle with Rheinfels, are the two ruins called "The Mouse" and "The Cat," of the latter of which we give no fingerings. These singular titles originated in the fact that the castle of the Count of Katzenellenbogen (cats' elbow) deriving its denomination from the family name of the owners, the castle of Thurnberg was called "The Mouse," in contradistinction to it. Near these ruins rises the dark and precipitous rock of Lurlei (see the Engraving), celebrated for its echo and for the fanciful legends that are connected with it. A railway tunnel through the rock has rudely disturbed the poetry of this enchanting spot. There is something singularly incongruous in the sight of a 12.20 train thundering through the Lurlei tunnel. Not that it seems to have affrighted the shocking siren who dwells there, for still the pursuit of the grotto winds his horn, and still the gun is fired and the echo still gives back the sound fifteen times repeated with as much power as when it could grow old or tired. All tongues are familiar to her echoes. Is it German in the far-off past to hear the playful inquiry, "Who is the Burgomaster of Oberwesel?" to which she answers "Esel" (an ass). A small joke that still stirs the choler of that insulted dignitary, and still raises a laugh of laughter from the shades of Karl and Hermann. At the feet of Lurlei eddies the Gewirre, or rapid, over the "bank" formed by seven rocks, which overcome the river, as the name says, seven fair sisters condemned by the Rhine-god to this hard fate for their fickle and heartless conduct to their admirers.

On an island in the middle of the river, opposite to Caub, is seen the Castle of Pfalz, an exceedingly picturesque object, of which an Engraving is given. It is as old as the thirteenth century, when it was built as a means of enabling the Emperor to exact toll from all the vessels that passed by. Further on, we pass Bacharach (Bacca Bar), so named from the earliest instance of honour of Bacchus, who is here most propitious to the vine. At Lorch commences the district of the Rheingau, where the richest wine is produced, from excessive and minute labour bestowed upon the cultivation of the vine in these parts is almost incredible, and justifies the high price which is set upon the first growths of Steinberg and Johannisberg, not to mention the humbler vintages of Markobrunner, Assmannshausen, and Rüdesheim.

From Lorch to Bingen the view of the Rhine is magnificent in the extreme. On the one side, the lofty vineyard slopes rise to a great height—in some places nearly a thousand feet above the river—that the marvel is how it is possible either to cultivate or gather in the vintage. On the other side, a series of ruined castles crown the rocky heights, of which we give an Engraving of Falkenburg, destroyed, as usual, by the French, in 1689. It is a wild place, and, when we remember that it was built for purposes of plunder and bloodshed, we cease to feel that its innocence was deeply injured by fate which at length overtook it. The noble castle of Rheinstein (see Engraving), after long being in ruins, was completely restored, in 1823, by Prince Frederick of Prussia, who caused the interior to be fitted up in the ancient style, so that amongst the dismantled fortresses of the Rhine there might be at least one which should recall in every detail their former magnificence. It is used as the summer residence of our Princess Royal and her husband; and as we pass its lordly towers and see it throned upon the rock, like the monarch of all that fair region, we feel that England's eldest daughter is housed in no unworthy home. Farsing by the rapids of the Binger Loch and Bingen, we arrive at Rüdesheim, where we can land to see the glorious panorama of the Niederwald, and learn that behind the hills and rocks that inclose the river there are scenes of the most surpassing beauty, and that the Rheinland is not less interesting than the Rhine itself.

If we do not stay here, we may hasten on, past green islands and a gradually subsiding shore, till we come within sight of the red towers of Mainz or Mayence, and there bid farewell to the picturesque scenery and the romantic legends of the Rhine.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1864.

"THE kettle began it" (to borrow the opening of one of Mr. Dickens's most charming little books), but the pot immediately became quite as black and rather more noisy. We allude, of course, to the disgraceful proceedings in a city which the other day belonged to her Majesty Queen Victoria, but which, while we write, is, and for anything the authorities seem to care, is likely to be, in the hands of a double mob of the most awfully kind. While Englishmen are dwelling with regret and tenderness upon the frightful condition of America, and are silently thankful that peace is given us in our time, they are suddenly shamed and scandalised by the news that, in the second city in Ireland, and in a flourishing and famous mart of commerce, society is resolving itself into its original elements of barbarism. To dignify the brutal fray with the name of religious discord is to misuse words, and in those of the Laureate, to abuse Heaven's best gift of speech. There may be nominal Protestantism on the one side and nominal Roman Catholicism on the other, but the riots in Belfast are simply an illustration of savage nature broken loose and availing itself of any pell that can stimulate to increased ferocity.

Daniel O'Connell having been dead seventeen years, it has occurred to the Irish mind that ingratitude to his memory is no longer tolerable. England has no right to sneer at the procrastination while her own metropolitan monument to her greatest naval hero remains unfinished half a century after the day that saw him destroy the nautical power of her enemies at a blow. It were idle and unjust to pretend that Ireland did not owe a great debt to O'Connell, and it is not because he had many faults, and because the latter part of his life was spent in insincere advocacy of a sham, that Irishmen have a right to forget the good service he did for her in earlier days. If Englishmen, from whom he won the Emancipation Act, can acknowledge this, it is not his own countrymen, for whom he won it, that should forget it. A statue to O'Connell was assuredly due from the Irish, and we shall not be surprised to learn that English gold has also been cast into the treasury. But it is the unhappy fortune of Ireland that her best and most just demonstrations shall arouse the spirit of factious hate among her own children. The news that thousands had assembled in Dublin to pay homage to the memory of the Liberator instantly excited rage among the lower order of Orangemen in Belfast, and they prepared a mock counter-ceremonial which was in itself contemptible and despicable, but which assumed a serious character as soon as the ruffianism which prompted it discovered that it might revel without check from the authorities. We discard, at all events until further proof, the idea that the riots which ensued in Belfast were not altogether displeased at the anti-O'Connell outbreak and that the police have not been permitted to act with full vigour. We hesitate to attribute to men, whose position is a prima facie argument that they are good citizens, the crime of having afforded the slightest encouragement to riot which has led to murder. It is easy to make such charges, and they are usually made in presence of similar circumstances. But it will, we fear, be very difficult for the Belfast authorities to show that they acted with energy and promptitude when the first symptoms of the rabble whose passions were being inflamed; they knew, also, the character of the hostile rabble that would rise to revenge the insult to O'Connell's memory. An easy case the original demonstration should have been checked, the effigy of O'Connell should have been seized, the Riot Act should have been enforced without hesitation or compunction. It will be useless to plead that the magistrates had not sufficient force. An armed and fearless police, like that of Belfast, could have dealt with any mob; and there were troops at hand, and others within a short call. A single procession, of course, followed, the lesson of impunity having been learned; and a vile parody of the most solemn ceremony of the Protestant and Roman Catholic Church was presented. Then the other mob rose, and thence-forth it was difficult to say whether it was to edify or to being most atrociously wanton; unoffending passengers arriving by rail were assailed, and discharges of firearms on both sides completed the scene, which converted a peaceful commercial city into the semblance of a place given up to the horrors of war. But, up to the dispatch of the last mails, the magistrates had been afraid to take the only step that could put an end to a murderous and brutal conflict. They had soldiers enough to sweep Belfast from end to end and to drive the two bodies of ruffians into their dens. But martial law had not been proclaimed, and though the police had at length been allowed to fire, it is clear, from the list of the wounded, that it was not upon the rioters that their shots told. What was needed was a stern example, by which the fiercest leaders of the affrays should have suffered in the interest of society and humanity. It may be that we shall hear that at last the authorities have done what should have been done at first, and have made an example of a few for the future, and we are more likely to hear that the rioters have exhausted themselves, and retired until they see an opportunity for fresh outrage.

The whole affair is so shameful and so scandalous to a nation which boasts its power of uniting perfect freedom with perfect order, that Belfast riots and the conduct of some of the magistrates must be a subject for either Parliamentary or Government inquiry. It is not to be endured that the Continent should point the finger of scorn at an Executive which permits a week of civil war in the second city of the sister kingdom. We have no desire that British magistrates should imitate those of countries in which the soldier is instantly summoned to suppress popular disturbance. We know, of course, that had such brutalities as those of Belfast been perpetrated for three hours in any great city in France, the fourth hour would have seen the streets swept with grape, and the ruffians dead in hundreds along the streets whose peace they had violated. We wish to hear of nothing of this kind. But there are times when the full strength of society must be put forth to preserve that for which alone society is constituted; and one of those occasions was presented in Belfast when these riots began. The magistrates do not

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor and attended by the Hon. Mrs. Coke, Lieutenant-General Knollys, and Major Teesdale, left Marlborough House on Wednesday evening and reached Euston Station at half-past eight. Their Royal Highnesses took their departure from the Euston station of the London and North-Western Railway by the 8.40 "limited mail" train, and the usual state arrangements being attached to the train. The Prince and Princess were received at the station by Mr. Hunt (superintendent of the company) and some of the directors, by whom they were conducted to their carriage, and the train proceeded on its route to Stirling, whither their Royal Highnesses arrived shortly after eight o'clock the next morning (Thursday), and were received by Provost Murrie and other official dignitaries and a large concourse of spectators. On alighting the Prince and Princess were greeted with truly loyal acclamations. Provost Murrie had the honour of being presented to their Royal Highnesses. Prince Albert Victor was received at the station direct to Caldander. The Prince and Princess drove to Campbell's Royal Hotel, where they partook of breakfast; after which their Royal Highnesses proceeded in a carriage and pair to Stirling Castle, and visited the ramparts, the Douglas-room, the armoury, the palace, &c. The Prince and Princess purchased various articles from the table of the Douglas-room, formed of the wood of that celebrated apartment and also of Bannockburn and Abbotsford oak. The Prince wrote in the visitors-book, "The Prince and Princess of Wales." Their Royal Highnesses afterwards returned to the hotel, and thence drove to the railway station. The Prince and Princess were received at the Stirling station by the Duke of Montrose, Lord and Lady Abercrombie, and Mr. Stirling of Kippendavie. Their Royal Highnesses travelled in a saloon carriage attached to the 10.45 train upon the Forth and Clyde Junction Railway to Balloch. The Duke of Montrose (one of the directors) and Major Erskine had the honour of accompanying the Prince and Princess. At Stirling and at the various stations along the route their Royal Highnesses were enthusiastically cheered by those assembled to greet them. At the Drymen station the Princess was presented with a bouquet of flowers. Upon their arrival at Balloch the Prince and Princess were received by Sir James Colquhoun, of Luss, Bart., Lieutenant Yule of Leny, and other tenor corps, represented by about 120 men, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Buchanan, were also up the line at Balloch station, and upon the arrival of the train the volunteers presented arms and the band played the National Anthem. The line being formed from the pier to the carriage, along the ranks and the plaudits of a numerous assemblage of spectators. During the inspection the commissioners of the pier had the honour of being presented to his Royal Highness. Upon arriving at Balloch pier the Prince and Princess remained in their carriage until the departure of the ordinary passenger by the steamer for Inverkilnbonnond. At one o'clock their Royal Highnesses proceeded along the pier to the Prince Consort steamer, where several of the directors of the Forth and Clyde Railway and of the Lochlomond Steam Shipping Company were in waiting to receive the Prince and Princess on board. The pier was gaily decorated with flowers and evergreens, and a number of small boats were ranged in the loch, filled with spectators, from whom, as well as from the pier, the steamer was loudly cheered. Their Royal Highnesses received a warm greeting. At a few minutes past one the Princess Consort steamer cast off up the loch, and proceeded to Benlomond; and, in order to enable the Prince and Princess to see the whole of the fine mountain scenery, she again returned down the loch to Tarbet, thus affording a fine view of Ben-Arthur and the whole of the beautiful scenery of Arrochar in passing. The steamer made no stoppages, and reached Inversnaid, where their Royal Highnesses landed. Upon disembarking, they were received by a guard of honour of the Inland and Arrochar Highland Volunteer Corps. The Prince and Princess thence drove to Stronachlahar, and thence sailed over Loch Katrine to the entrance of the Trossachs, and afterwards proceeded to the Bridge of Turk, about ten miles from Callander, to Sinclair's Hotel, where they remained for the night, and left the following morning (Friday) for Callander, travelling by special train to Dunblane. Their Royal Highnesses, with Prince Albert Victor, resumed their route to Perth, which was reached at ten minutes to twelve, and were received at the station by the Lord Provost and other civic authorities. The Lord Provost and Bailie Fleming had the honour of being presented to the Prince and Princess by Lieutenant-General Knollys. Their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the refreshment-rooms and partook of refreshments. The Princess, attended by the Hon. Mrs. Coke, afterwards drove round the South Inch and along the Edinburgh road. The Prince took a stroll through the city, and visited the cookeworks of Mr. William Thomson, returning by Marshall-place to the general station. Thence their Royal Highnesses continued their route northwards by the 12.40 train, arriving at the Ferryhill Junction at ten minutes past four, and proceeded at once to Aboyne, posting thence to Abergeldie, whither their Royal Highnesses arrived at half-past seven in the evening.

The Prince and Princess of Wales will, at the beginning of next month, proceed to Copenhagen on a visit to King Christian and his Royal Consort, father and mother of the Princess of Wales. The Prince and Princess will also visit Stockholm and other ports in the Baltic.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

St. Stephen's Church, Kirkstall, was reopened for Divine service on Wednesday week, after extensive alterations.

The Archbishop of York has graciously intimated his intention of holding the primary visitation of the clergy of his diocese early in October.

Mr. John Lloyd, of Bronppry, proprietor of the Fovyn Brick and Tilney Works, has offered to give 100,000 bricks for the erection of a university for Wales, provided it is built at Towyn.

The Temple Church, which has been thoroughly cleansed during the vacation, will be opened for Divine service on Sunday, Oct. 2.

The canonry in York Cathedral vacant by the resignation of the Rev. Richard Harrison has been conferred on the Rev. Henry Hey, Head Master of St. Peter's School, York, Prebendary of the cathedral, and Rector of Wigginton, near York.

The Bishop of Salisbury commenced his fourth triennial visitation in the cathedral on Thursday week. He was attended by his Chaplains, the Rev. H. Moule, Vicar of Fordington, Dorset, and the Rev. C. Phillimore, the Chancellor of the diocese. There was a large gathering of the cathedral clergy.

Mr. Gilbert Scott has just made a report to the Dean and Chapter of Lichfield on the works coming on for the restoration of the cathedral. The report is long, and is accompanied by plans and drawings now exhibited in the Chapter-house at Lichfield. The probable cost, including new screens, grilles for side arches, &c., is £20,000. The works coming on for the restoration and decoration of the Lady Chapel, is estimated at between £12,000 and £15,000.

The Bishop of London on Tuesday consecrated the massive brass eagle lectern which has been presented to the cathedral by Mr. Thompson, Surrey. The manuscript immediately adjoins the parish church of Lyne, and is supposed to have belonged to it. To this building, we believe, will be restored the remains of the late Mr. Lyne Stephens, which were temporarily deposited in Brompton Cemetery some months ago; and the grief of whom, buried in the mausoleum is, we are informed by the sentence of consecration, reserved for the Resurrection Day.

Tewkesbury Abbey Church, erected in the thirteenth century, is about undergoing a thorough repair under the care of Gilbert Scott, who attended a meeting of the principal inhabitants of Tewkesbury, held a few days ago, at the Town-hall, for the purpose of explaining his views. He has been filled with stained glass, at the cost of Mrs. Stevenson, of Hampstead, as a memorial to her husband, who died a few months ago. Bell's Messenger says: The Leeds Intelligencer states that a stained-glass window has been fixed in the east end of Kirkstall Abbey Church, consisting of three lancet-shaped windows in that portion of the sacred edifice. It has been presented by a friend and client of the late Mr. Walter Hawksworth.

On Wednesday the Bishop of Ripon had engaged to consecrate a burial-ground at Thorpe, near Wakefield; but, on arriving at the Leeds station about ten o'clock, he was informed that the train to Leeds for Wakefield for some considerable time. He, however, heard that there was a train leaving Leeds for Wakefield at 10.30, and he went on to Leeds by another train expected; for it was found that there was no carriage which could be obtained at Leeds. The Bishop, however, by no small exertion, the Lordship volunteered to go on the engine with the driver and stoker, if allowed to do so. Permission was granted, and his Lordship actually performed the journey on the engine; and so agreeable (says the Manchester Guardian) did he make himself to the engine-driver and stoker, that, on parting with the worthy Bishop, he shouldn't mind having one on his engine with him every day.

An important modification in the rules affecting the transmission of pictures and samples is about to be adopted by the officials of St. Martin's-le-Grand. The number of articles permitted to be sent will be reduced by one third at each step in the scale of charges; thus, packets not exceeding four ounces in weight will be forwarded for 3d.; those exceeding four but not exceeding eight ounces, for 4d.; exceeding eight but not exceeding sixteen ounces, for 6d.; exceeding sixteen, but not exceeding twenty-four ounces, for 1s. The latter weight is the largest allowed to be transmitted; and there are several restrictions as to the articles sent, which have for their object to guard against any improper use of the privileges now granted. On the other hand, numerous articles hitherto prohibited from being sent by this means are allowed—the core being observed that they shall be so packed as not to injure any other contents of the mail-bags. The sample-post, which was established in October last, has already been found extremely beneficial in the workings by a large class of men of business; and there can be no doubt that the additional facilities now afforded will tend as much to increase the revenue of the department as to promote the public convenience.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

It is well when the event of the week is the publication of a new poem, just as it is well when a nation has no history, no great battles, successful generals, or plotting ministers to write and talk about. This week has that white stone wherewith to be marked; and even the literary reviewer of the Inquirer has stepped out of his way to review the poem two days after it has been published. It is said that we have "no poetry in us" in these prosaic times; but a sale of 16,000 copies of one of the small works of the Laureate in subscription only, and the fact of a second edition being demanded before a first was issued, says something to the contrary. Truly, this nation always loved poetry; and even in troublous time, when England was divided between Puritanism and a re-nascent libertinism—between fears of the Plague and hopes of the Restoration, Milton sold "Paradise Lost" to a generous and speculative bookseller, Samuel Simmons, for an immediate payment of £5 and a prospective other £5 when 1300 copies should have been sold. Well, the 1300 copies of that magnificent work were sold in two years, and in April, 1668, John Milton exclaimed and took his extra £5. This edition consisted of 1500 copies; but, the nature of the work being considered, the sparse population of this country, the limited reading, the want of magazines, reviews, and advertisements—all these being taken into account, the sale is wonderfully rapid as that of "Enoch Arden." Milton's widow sold all her claims on that Paradise, which was indeed lost to her, for £8; so that the generous Simmons gave just £18 (or, as others calculate, £20) for the finest epic in the English language.

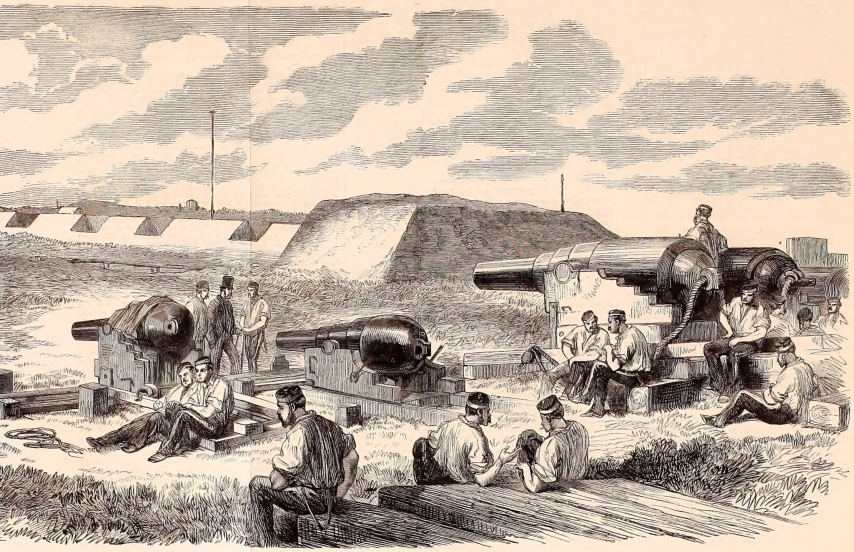
The above being remembered, readers who are not behind the curtain may see what a leading journal means when, with one of those curious outbreaks which distinguish its genius, it insists that authors have positively little or no right to the invention which they put forward, and that the patent laws, for the good of the public, had better be abolished. That would be a splendid morsel for a man of no memory to swallow with his breakfast-roll. Being very fairly tackled upon this point by a correspondent, the Times forswears itself in a declaration to it that authors have very little right to their own works, and that the laws of copyright could be as little defended as the patent laws. "Whether the whole argument in favour of copyright can be sound may, perhaps, be doubted. The best works of literature, and those which possess most permanent value, are written without the slightest copyright." The conclu hes spoken, and we, like Captain Cuttle, have made a note of it. If there be any property in the world which a man has a right to, it is surely that coined in his brain and made valuable by his scholarship and thought. The doctrine of seizing the parks, mansions, and dwelling-houses of the rich, because whether the arguments in favour of their possession were sound, would be received with a shout of laughter and execration; the hint that lawyers, authors, and artists have no right to their own brains, and ought to employ them for the benefit of the public, is a little distortion of MM. Charles Fourier and Robert Owen which excites no remark. Indeed, what possible right can the Laureate have to his two thousand pounds? "Let him write," or he may not write? In what right has Mr. Dickens to the ten thousand which, it is whispered, he has made French? Or Lord Lyndhurst with this aristocrat of the pen! knock his copy-money out of the greedy author's fist; let his wife and children starve, so that King Public may own the nothing it

A valuable hint has been thrown out by a writer in the Spectator. Every one who has travelled knows how much there is to learn, as Jean Jacques Rousseau has the credit of remarking, the most puzzling thing in the world. What would be to with our criminals? The mail brings to us from Australia a wail about the criminal population thereto transported. Now it would seem that, it being an ill wind that blows nobody good, the loss of the Germanic in the war may get us out of a difficulty. Iceland is for sale; at least, it is not, but it may be, for the Danish Government has offered it to us cheap at £4000. The island is larger than Ireland; extremely salubrious, if very cold; and would do excellently as a penal settlement. Why not buy it? The Arctic Circle would make some valuable ice, and by being more closely packed, and our criminals have a dread of the cold. The suggestion is tenable; the only other localities to compare with it as a penal settlement being West Africa and the Caucasus Mountains, which have lately proved so fatal to us in Captain R. F. Burton. The prospect of Iceland to a soft and voluptuous Italian would be a limited punishment, but terrible. A change of that cold country we involuntarily recall a sentence of Sydney Smith, when a young reviewer in Edinburgh — after reading M. Cuvier's account, says he, of the mammoth and blighted Lapplanders, we were struck with the infinite delight they must have in dying, the only circumstance under which they can enjoy a temperature to the heat of mankind." Perhaps our forcés, unwilling emigrants to Iceland, would prove to be Lapplanders.

The name of Captain Burton recalls the fact that that great linguist and traveller is at present not in his consulship at Fernan fo Po, but in a recess now past its middle at Trieste. When we remember the little difference between him and Captain Speke—who formerly, in an exploration in Africa, separated under fire—and how Captain Speke puts forward to having discovered the source of the Nile, we prick up our ears and make ready for a literary duello. Speke is about to bring forward a book entitled "Discovery of the Source of the Nile," or with some such title: Burton will follow with another book, entitled "Not the Source of the Nile," or "Speke and Nonsense." Who shall decide when Captains disagree? Has the source of the Nile been discovered? Mr. Punch assumed that. It is said that Father Nilus Fluvius, who, it would appear from the artist, who was on the spot, accorded an interview to that artist, is not the Nile at all.

Amongst the curiosities of literature, a reference has been made during the past week to some juvenile poems which Tennyson thought fit to suppress, but which have republished in America. This was called forward by the announcement of "an original poem" written by the Queen in the Highlands. The announcement was a mistake, the original being merely a parody on "Mariana," which is suspiciously like one which was done about a year ago in Punch. Parody, however, is a capital republished; would call it forth as never. Lord Wodehouse, a very clever and useful diplomatist, has been talked of as Lord Carlisle's successor. Why can we not rather send thither his Royal Highness Prince Alfred? He would king it right royally; the Irish, a loyal, gallant nation, would jump for joy; and her Majesty the Queen would follow the idea laid down by Prince Albert of utilising our Princes. Moreover, the Royal forgetfulness or neglect of Ireland would thereby be avoided.

Crinoline, which slays our women as war slays our men, has, of course, claimed a fresh victim during the past week to death by fire. Talk about Juggernaut or Suttee, what are they to the idol Fashion? And yet it is not quite certain as that an announcement that the ladies of Vienna have, in deference to the enhancement that the ladies of Vienna have, in deference to the announcement that the ladies of Vienna have, in deference to the Empress of Austria, finally abandoned crinoline, "was received by a shout of defiance!" So one sees that, in defence of a silly fashion, the ladies of Paris can rival the wild behaviour of the Dames de la Halle.



The infant Hercules of Sir Joshua Reynolds, a farmer named Rolfe, is, we are told by the newspapers, still alive. Probably Sir Joshua's model was then one model: a fine old man, a picture-dealer in King-street, Covent-garden, we know to be proud of the reputation of having sat to Sir Joshua both as Pack and the Hercules.

STATUE OF PRINCE ALBERT UNCOVERED BY THE PRINCE OF WALES AT THE LICENSED VICTUALLERS' ASYLUM.

A BRIEF report of the proceedings of Tuesday week at the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum in the Old Kent-road appeared in our last Number. Our present Illustration gives a view of that interesting scene. The Prince of Wales arrived at noon in a state carriage, accompanied by the Earl of Mount-Edgcumbe, General Knollys, and Major Teesdale. The Household Cavalry, the Coldstream Guards, led by Mr. D. Godfrey, played "God save the Queen," and a guard of honour was formed by the Hon. Artillery Company in the portico, where his Royal Highness was received by the chairman, trustees, and governors of the asylum, the chaplain, the secretary, and the medical officer. He was then conducted to the chapel, whence he was escorted by a procession, thanked on one side by the inmates of the asylum and on the other by the children of the schools, to visit the "Waterloo Wing," and to inspect the stone laid by his lamented father but a short time before the late Prince Consort's death. The hand played the national anthem, after which his Royal Highness was escorted to the foundation-stone of the "Albert Wing," laid by the Prince Consort June 2, 1849, and thence through the chapel to the open space in front of the main entrance to the building, where a large marquee had been erected, covering a platform which faced the statue of the late Prince Consort. The secretary, Mr. T. Jones, read an address, which referred to the interest shown by the late Prince in the charitable institutions of the licensed victuallers, and begged that the Prince of Wales would be pleased to favour them with his patronage likewise. His Royal Highness then said, "I consider the statue now before me now uncovered," which was immediately done. As the statue became visible the Prince looked steadily at the features, and the members of the Licensed Victuallers' Choral Association then sang the following hymn, which had been set to some music composed by the late Prince Consort:—

> Swell the full chorus to Albert's high praise!
> Record him, ye bards, in the song of the days!
> Flow sweetly the numbers that dwell on his name,
> And rouse the wide nation to sing to the theme.

Mr. Earl, the sculptor, has represented the Prince Consort in modern attire. One hand grasps a scroll, the other lies on the capital of a column, over which is draped a cloak. The figure, which is eight feet high, stands upon a pedestal of white marble, which, with the statue, measures more than twenty feet in height, so that the full height of the monument is rather over fifteen feet. On the west tablet of the pedestal there is the following inscription:—"In memory of A. D. 1863. A lasting tribute of respect to the memory of Albert the Good." On the other tablets are various records, one of which states that Mr. Earl was the statue was inaugurated on Aug. 9, 1864, by the Prince of Wales. During the ceremony of uncovering the statue, a chorus, adapted from Handel's oratorio of "Solomon," was sung. The children, led by Mr. Cairn, then approached the dais and delivered an address thanking his Royal Highness for the honour done to the institution by the visit now graciously replied. The "Hallelujah Chorus" was then sung, after which his Royal Highness and suite retired.

LORD PALMERSTON LAYING THE FOUNDATION OF THE NEW EXCHANGE AT BRADFORD.

OUR Engraving represents the scene at Bradford on Tuesday week, when the foundation-stone of the new building of the Exchange was laid by the Prince Minister, whose speech on this occasion was fully reported in last. The earnest spirit of the promoters of the erection of this Illustration. Lord Palmerston had reached Lightcliffe, five miles from Bradford, on the Monday evening, and was for that night the guest of Mr. Ripley, of Hollins House, where he and his party dined at dinner, and where, on the Tuesday morning, the directors of the New Exchange breakfasted with him. At two o'clock the Mayor and friends accompanied his noble guest to the beautiful pleasure-ground, Peel Park, munificently presented to the people of Bradford, by the wedding-day of the Prince of Wales, by Mr. Thompson, formerly Mayor of the town. His Lordship was received at the park with a salute of artillery by the Bradford and Bingley Rifle Volunteers, and the cheers of a numerous assembly. A procession was organised to escort the noble visitor to Bowling Green, accompanied by the Bradford and Bowling Volunteers, headed by their band; the Chamber of Commerce, the guardians and overseers of the poor, the Bradford Corporation, comprising the mayor, aldermen, and councillors; the magistrates; the Mayor, with Lord Palmerston, and another detachment of rifle volunteers marching in front. The line of route was through Otley-road, East-parade, Leeds-road, Bridge-street, Market-street, Lower Cheapside, a part of Market-street, Charles-street, Bank-street, and the Old Market. The people thronged the streets, masses along the whole line of route, and at the Old Market a dense crowd had assembled to witness the ceremony of the interesting topic, which were covered with people. Nearly the whole of the site of the proposed building were surrounded by flags, banners, and mural scrolls, which were occupied by spectators provided with tickets. On the arrival of the cortège the bands played "See the conquering hero comes." His Lordship, the Mayor, the Town Clerk, Corporation, and the other dignitaries having alighted, and taken up their position around the suspended stone, a fine bass voice belonging to Mayor briefly welcomed Lord Palmerston to Bradford. A handsome silver trowel was then presented to his Lordship, who proceeded, seconded arm, to spread the mortar on the bed of the stone with the usual formalities. A bottle, containing newspapers and photographs of Lord Palmerston, the Mayor, and Bradford, was deposited in the cavity of the lower stone. Alderman Wright, one of the directors of the Exchange Company, then, on behalf of the directors, presented to his Lordship an address, which was read by Mr. John Hawson. After thanking the noble Viscount for the honour of his presence on that day, the address gave detailed some statistical particulars of the growth of the town, which therefore required the erection of a new Exchange. The building now used as an Exchange was opened in 1828. Three years after the population of the borough was 43,527; in 1861 it was upwards of 106,000. In 1828 there were not more than two dozen persons trading as stuff-merchants in the borough; in 1861 there were 151. In 1841 the annual rental of property assessed to the poor-rate amounted to £137,578; this year it amounted to £315,740. In 1841 the number of houses was 8193; now it is about 24,800. In 1830 the number of registered voters was 1347; now it is 4564. The tables of bulls and machinery; of imports, as to wool; and exports, as to worsted fabrics, would show a similar increase. It was not, therefore, surprising that the accommodation of 1828 was inadequate to the requirements of 1864. The directors trusted that the French treaty of commerce was but the first fruits of that enlightened policy of peace on which they congratulated his Lordship. They welcomed Lord Palmerston, and were glad to see him amongst them, after so many honoured years of public service, not

> An old man broken with the storms of State,

> A man of sovereign parts,
> Whose age has done no hurt.

Lord Palmerston, on receiving the address, expressed his thanks for the cordial welcome given to him. The foundation-stone of the new Exchange, he said, had been laid long since by the people of Bradford themselves, by their own industry and successful exertions. He trusted that Bradford was destined to equal some of the larger seats of industry, and that he might see its progress continued even more rapidly than during the period spoken of in the address. He considered his work that day as the foundation of a temple of peace. He particularly referred to the good effects of the commercial treaty with France. After a prayer and benediction from the Vicar of Bradford, the National Anthem was played and sung; the proceedings then terminated. In the evening, as reported in our last, Lord Palmerston was entertained by the Mayor and citizens of Bradford in St. George's Hall.

In his plan for building the new Exchange, the object of the architect has been to avoid any sacrifice of the expensive and valuable ground on which it has to be erected; and yet, at the same time, to prevent the extreme irregularity of the site from being internally visible. The lines of the intended new and improved streets have also been kept in view. The principal entrance to the Exchange will be under the tower, and combined with an open arcade, giving a picturesque effect to the approach, and affording also the advantage of a covered outer area during the hours of change. The Exchange itself will be a large and handsome room, 72 ft. by 60 ft., and capable of containing 600 persons seated. The inner parallelogram will be surrounded by banded shafts of red polished granite, from the capitals of which spring arches filled in with tracery of mediæval design, the gable ends being also filled with spandril windows of appropriate character. The roof will be of open timber-work, with curved hammer-beams and wrought-iron spandrils, the design throughout having a strong constructive character, to which principle all decoration has been made subservient. The news-room floor, on the same level as that of the Exchange, will have a width of upwards of 200 feet. The entrance will be from Bank-street, and the Exchange can also be approached from the same vestibule. The valuable frontage to Market-street has been divided into shops and shops, each having a cellar under and show-room over. On the upper floor a room for the Chamber of Commerce, 42 ft. by 20 ft., is provided, with a library and secretary's room attached. The remainder of the first floor and the whole of the second floor are divided into suites of first-class offices, with the most desirable frontages to the streets. The roofs are fireproof throughout, and will be let off as wine or other storage vaults. From this investment considerable revenue will be derived, as anticipated. Careful arrangements are proposed throughout for lighting, ventilating, and heating the building. The contract price is, we believe, about £27,000. The design of the building was selected from six sets, submitted in a limited competition, and is by Messrs. Lockwood and Mawson, of Bradford and London.

RIOTING AT BELFAST.

THERE has been more than one of these disgraceful riots at Belfast. The mine of "religious" madness was set fire to by a number of boys and girls producing, on Monday week, an effigy of Guiccioli, with a placard on it bearing the inscription, "Pope and Wiseman." This effigy was carried about in a flaming cart, and was finally burned in front of the Roman Catholic chapel in Donegall-street. Ultimately the effigy was set on fire on Boyne Bridge amid much laughter. The mere act of burning Guiccioli in effigy would not have caused the riot that night. Accordingly a coffin was purchased, large numbers of the militia-men were treated to drink, and the procession, with the coffin in front, playing a Dead March, varied with lively airs, followed by the effigy, the cart, and the crowd. The lights or flambeaux were carried aloft, and in the rear a dense mass of millworkers—boys and girls, in their working dresses, from the York Street flax-mill, &c., with sticks, bludgeons, loose jackets, short petticoats, and for the most part unshod. The procession, which was to have been Sunday's look, was kept about a mile and a half, but admittance was refused. The coffin was then carried to the Roman Catholic burial-ground, where, after the usual ceremony, it was taken down into the Blackstaff. Hitherto no damage had been done, and the police were not interfered with. Now, however, the Protestants there were made aware of what was going on, and at once set off to break their opponents' heads. The police, on the other hand, came down from the station in which the "Liberator's" memory had been dishonoured. The first stones were thrown at the Roman Catholic chapel, which is situated between the Wesleyan Methodist place of worship in Davis street—nearly all the glass in the chapel windows was broken—and the chapel in which the Free Presbyterians lived in the Pound district were served in the same way, and a number of persons were injured, some of whom they were obliged to take home in acting upon. Mr. Montgomery, living in Eagle-street, and owner of a large number of houses, was driven out of his house by the mob, and the furniture taken out and broken in the street.

On Wednesday night the millworkers of both sides going to work between five and six o'clock made several attacks on individuals, Protestant and Roman Catholic, who were passing to and from their work. An attack was made on Brown-square by the Roman Catholic party, who, on being repulsed, threw stones into the windows of the houses, who sallied forth to protect their houses, and who successfully repelled the assault. The Roman Catholics then came down with their forces, and whence they emerged again in a short time armed with brickbats and paving-stones, which they threw with unerring precision, and which caused nearly five or six severely. The remainder of the night was anxiously spent in expectation of a renewal of the attack, which, however, was not made. But in about an hour after, the scouts from the Pound (Roman Catholics) having reported that the Protestants were in force in Sandy-row, they made for that street, smashing the windows on both sides as they proceeded. In a few minutes the police were on the spot, but the rioters fled at their approach. The police, but not before the constabulary arrived and captured one or two of them, who were lodged in the police office, where they were severely reprimanded. The same party made another attack in a different direction, but were driven back by the police. The police remained on duty during the night, and the remainder of the morning; and in one of the subsequent personal encounters between the police and the rioters, Mr. Shaw, a publican in Mr. Shaw's, and a respectable man, was struck on the head by a bludgeon, and severely injured. Mr. Malachy's chapel in M'Allan's fields, and in the route smashed several windows. The police were on duty during the night, and the Protestant boys in Donegal-square, Dr. Cooke's meeting-house, and the Rev. Mr. Shaw's, and in the neighbourhood of Sandy-row, were under arms, and in readiness to act. The Sandy-row party in retaliation breaking the windows of several Roman Catholics' houses. The police are reported to have been in most instances, some into collision with the police, who made several captures. The disturbances continued on Thursday night, and on Saturday night it was to have been in some measure regained.

On Tuesday night the disturbances were renewed. According to the dispatch the aggressors this time were the Roman Catholics, in the persons of the Pound millworkers, who made a violent attack upon the Protestant boys in Protestant houses in Brown-street, and also the National School. They came down in force, and commenced the attack by throwing stones at the windows, the remainder of the morning; and in one of the subsequent personal encounters between the police and the rioters, Mr. Shaw, a publican in Mr. Shaw's, and a respectable man, was struck on the head by a bludgeon, and severely injured. Mr. Malachy's chapel in M'Allan's fields, and in the route smashed several windows. The police were on duty during the night, and the Protestant boys in Donegal-square, Dr. Cooke's meeting-house, and the Rev. Mr. Shaw's, and in the neighbourhood of Sandy-row, were under arms, and in readiness to act. The Sandy-row party in retaliation breaking the windows of several Roman Catholics' houses. The police are reported to have been in most instances, some into collision with the police, who made several captures. The disturbances continued on Thursday night, and on Saturday night it was to have been in some measure regained.

On Tuesday the rioting was worse than ever. The police and military were called out, and were under arms. The Roman Catholics were joined by the police, and one by a rioter—and between fifty and sixty more or less injured. Several persons have been committed to prison, and there is every serious fracas at five a.m., when a man was killed in the mêlée. During the night the Protestants were reinforced by numbers from the country and from two gunsmiths' shops, carrying away all the firearms and powder they could find. The Roman Catholics were also reinforced in the same manner by the gunpowder stores, and took possession of the stock, to save it from the mob. The carnage, however, was frightful, and vengeance seems the watchword, mostly Roman Catholics, who worked such havoc on Monday.

The rioting at Belfast has been attended with fatal and lamentable consequences; great numbers were maimed, and five men were taken to the Belfast Infirmary dangerously wounded. Two of the five have since died. The collision took place between ship carpenters and navvies. The latter were employed in constructing a railway-bridge over the river Lagan, near the river by the Orange party. Nine or ten received gun-shot wounds, and one is reported dead.

Large reinforcements have been dispatched from Dublin, and there are now upwards of 2000 troops in Belfast.

The Roman Catholic Bishop has issued an address to his flock urging them to peace and quietness, but both sides appear to be beyond remonstrance.

The fees taken in public offices in the year ended March 31 last amounted to £1,467,046 2s. 8d.

The result of the elections for the Chamber of Representatives throughout Belgium gives a majority of twelve in favour of the Liberal party.

Both the City of Manchester and the Africa, in which were the contributions for the Lancashire distress, left Boston on the intimation, however, of the arrival of the Victoria, in which he was a passenger.

Mr. W. J. O'Doherty, of whose sculptures we have had occasion to speak with high commendation both in regard to their merits and to the promise they afford, has returned to Rome, where he will reside in the studio of his fine group of The Martyrs.

At a public meeting held at Antwerp a few days since, one of the speakers, M. Van Rysewyk, was received with such clamour by some of the persons that he could not obtain a hearing. He accordingly sat down, produced a pack of cards, and asked one of his neighbours to join him in a game of piquet till the noise should cease. The humorous expedient had the effect of instantaneously silencing his opponents.

At Warsaw, on Wednesday, Krasicki, who had been convicted of attempts on the life of General de Berg, when Governor of the city, suffered death at the hands of the hangman. Two of his accomplices appeared on the scaffold to receive the same punishment, but, at the last moment, the sentence was commuted to twenty years' hard labour. Six others concerned in these attempts have also been doomed to various terms of hard labour at the mines, which means a certain though lingering death.

COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

RESTING, the other day, upon one of the seats beneath the arcaneers of the Tower Green, and reflecting upon the spoliation of the historic features of the old fortress, we missed the statue of the Duke of Wellington, which, in 1848, was appropriately erected facing the Wellington Barracks. This statue was presented by the sculptor, T. Milnes, and its removal is, at least, unpleasantly startling more than one way. What could have become of the memorial next crossed our mind, when the inquiry was answered by the following apropos paragraph, which appeared on the last anniversary of the Battle of Waterloo:—

A fine Portland stone statue of the Duke of Wellington, 6 ft. 6 in. in height, which has lain for some years in the Tower among the old stores, was yesterday raised on a pedestal in the principal Wellington barrack square, facing the Horse Department offices to the pier in Woolwich Arsenal. The site selected, by Captain Collis, C.B., Royal Navy, Director-General of Stores, is highly appropriate. The statue, which is a work of some merit, has been somewhat damaged, and the nose and one of the fingers have been broken off, which will be of course repaired.

This memorial is no other than Mr. Milnes's statue, which was set up sixteen years since; when it was taken down we could hear, but surely its consignment to the old stores depository was ill treatment of the memory of our great commander and disrespect to the sculptor who sought to do honour to the hero. Woolwich may not be an inappropriate site for the statue; but why should it be removed from its original location? By-the-way, we see that the forty-foot block of granite has been conveyed from Cornwall to Strathfieldsaye for a portion of the monument which the present Duke of Wellington is erecting to his illustrious father. But where is the national memorial voted twelve years since to the hero? Such neglect is only exceeded by the indifference shown to a few thousands of pounds, which has left for twenty years unfinished the Nelson Column in Trafalgar-square! Dilemma the first. Cui bono, Commissioners?

Not far from this spot the "restoration," as it is termed, of Charing Cross is being proceeded with. One account, by-the-way, states "the old cross at Charing Cross" is being, in course of restoration; and this report adds, "Charing Cross was one of the twelve crosses erected in each stage of the Queen's progress from Lincoln to London to be a restoration, for there is no authority to follow. We believe Mr. Peter Cunningham to state correctly "there are several views of the cross, but one or two are inaccurate." Mr. Larwood, in a note, "the drawing described by Pennant is now in the Crowle Collection, in the British Museum." Mr. Larwood, in his "History of Signs," says that Charing-cross Railway station. 2. The chère Reine is mere fancy, the village of Charing, as we understand, being so named before Edward I. erected the cross to his chère Reine. 3. The crosses erected were nine in number, not twelve. 4. It is a sort of non sequitur for a writer upon the railway station to call it "Venetian," perhaps, to provoke a New Zealander in Notes and Queries. The sentiment of the whole article is somewhat out of place. As to the authority, neither Pennant nor the Crowle Pennant will satisfy archæologists.

The restoration of the Dutch Church, Austinfriars, to which we have so often referred, is being proceeded with. The cost is estimated at about £12,000 in addition to the sum subscribed by Mr. Edward Lucas and Mr. William Lightly. Mr. Spaul, of Norwich, holds the contract for the screenwork and pewing, all of which will be of oak. The open timber roof, in place of the present plaster ceiling, is supported on wreathed graceful columns, with arches springing from each pillar, and toward the end are six pillars in the form of a cross. The new vestry-rooms will have windows with flamboyant tracery, restored in Portland stone; the large west window, which is English Decorated, is next in line to that of Westminster Abbey. Every atom of ecclesiastical antiquities must rejoice at this efficient restoration of what Mr. Gilbert terms "a noble relic of a preaching-nave."

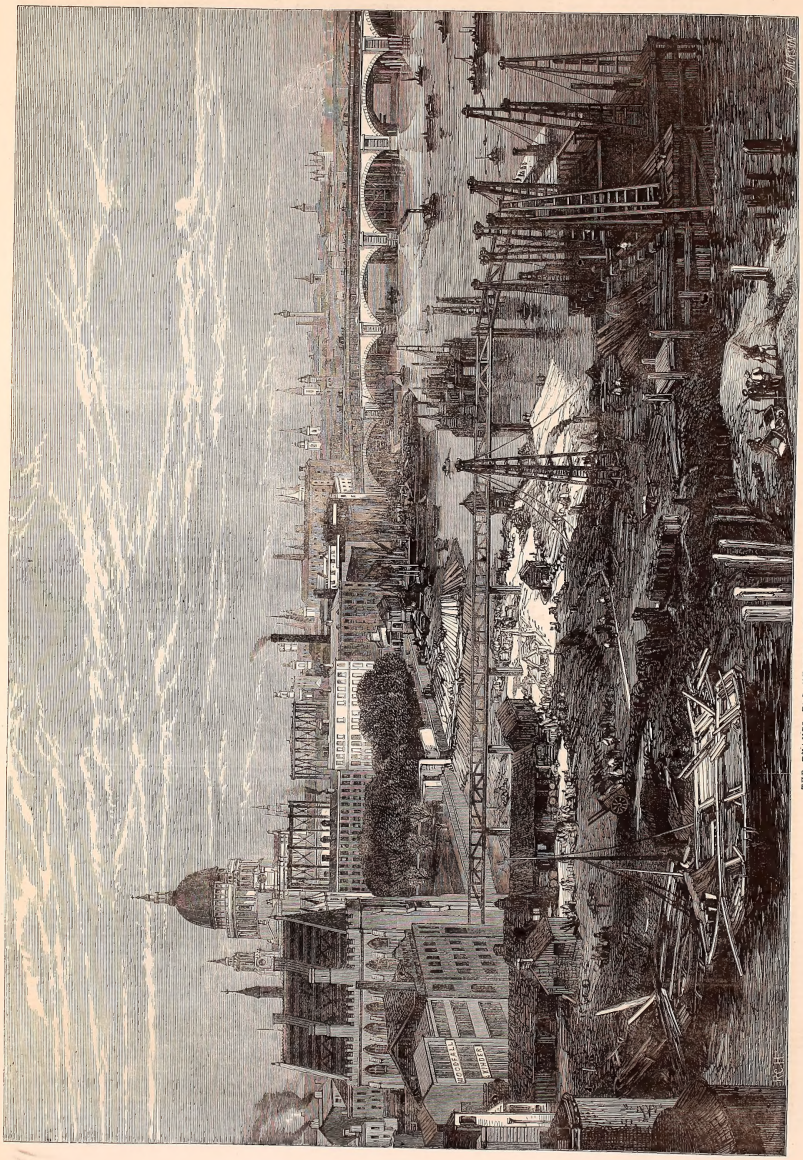
Seasonable appeals are now made—side by side with letters on the drought—in aid of the Metropolitan Free Drinking-Fountains Association. One of these eighty-seven fountains, between cattle-troughs, and more than fifty dog-troughs; yet mighty London is still almost without a drop of water for man or beast. Strange, the fountains must be increased fivefold. However, some liberal contributions have been made to the fund of the association, including £50 from a lady in Brompton and £100 from a gentleman in Pimlico for the two fountains just opened by the society outside the Kensington Museum and the Great Western Railway to Battersea. A gentleman in Fitzheim has offered to pay the cost of a fountain near the Kensington Potteries, provided the gutters of the roads be watered; and a lady at St. John's-wood has sent to the society a donation for the new cattle-trough just fixed in Finsbury-square. How Edmund Martin would have laughed at the act of misdirected benevolence!

Finsbury-circus is saved from the blatant iron coarser—or, in other words, the Metropolitan Railway—by Lower-hall Estate. Moorfields, with its associations of Bedlam and brokers' shops, have little to be cared for; but to sweep away the Finsbury garden, with its 700 shrubs, besides trees, and more than half a century of growth, by a railway raid would be downright desecration. The Hesperides did not more vigilantly protect the golden fruit than the Finsbury-circus gardeners chase their refreshing oasis. The railway engineers, by act of Parliament, are bound to this subject the property to partial spoliation, but it will be protected during the operations, and restored wherever injured; and, the railway being carried through the arena in a manner to cut off no convention the space now used by their Act to restore the surface of the garden and to lay out the ornamental beds as before. Nor have been interfered with to the satisfaction of some person to be appointed by the Board of Trade. Sir Joseph Paxton would be a first-rate arbiter of this Hortus Finsburyensis. The railway company, we are told, are to contribute nearly £100 to keep up the ornamental character of the grounds; and the contractors are to employ the gardeners from other parts of the line the sweepers may rise their heads with joy at the Collective Wisdom of St. Stephen's.

"Gigantic Mushrooms" have just cropped up with a vengeance. Dr. Le Bocédic states that on a soil of gypsum, manured with nitrate of potash, he has found the most enormous mushrooms, weighing "somewhat more than 1½ lb. avoirdupoise." This beats the growing of oysters in a wash-hand basin.

We have been favoured by a Correspondent with the following interesting note upon some curious specimens of the early ware of Wedgwood, which have very recently been contributed to Burslem, through at a century distance from his first success. It may be unknown to many of our readers that Wedgwood was born in a cottage at Yeaveley, adjoining Shirley Park, Yorkshire, the seat of Sir George Wombwell, Bart. Upon the very spot where Sir George Wombwell now has his library, Old Wedgwood had his shop. These were preserved upon by his son; hence the well-known couplet of that district:—

> At Yeveley there were parchens made
> By Willis Wedgwood, and young Shadrach.



A piece of this pottery, bearing date 1712, of nondescript shape, called in the catalogue "a cream-ewer," and another in the shape of a water-jar, fell under the hammer of Mr. Acton, auctioneer, a month since, at York. They were lately the property of Mr. Bainbridge, and were purchased by him at the sale of the effects of the late Mr. Scott, agent to the Wombwell family. Both specimens have been pronounced "early Wedgwood," and were duly sold as Yeaveley, with another piece of the same ware, either a tile or the broken neck of a large puncheon, was dug up at Upsall Castle, near Thirsk, about ten miles from Yeaveley.

We read in a letter from Mr. Frank Buckland to the Times that a large sturgeon was caught last week stranded in the river Severn at Tewkesbury; with much difficulty it was brought alive to Paddington; to be consigned to the pond at the garden of the Zoological Society; but at Paddington the sturgeon died. Its weight was 72½ lb., and it measured 8 ft. 9 in. in length. Mr. Buckland found it to contain an enormous mass of roe (such as is manufactured into caviare by the Russians), which weighed 42 lb., and which, as a calculation showed, contained no less than 1,881,600 eggs. This "royal fish," according to an old law, belonged to the Sovereign; because, as Mr. Kirwan tells us in "Rod and Gun," "by a statute of Edward II. it is said, 'the King shall have sturgeon taken in the sea or elsewhere within the realm.'"

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE racing of last week passed off without any startling incidents or any of those sensational episodes in the Ring that lead to angry discussions, threaten something worse, and then subside into nothing. The Railway Nursery Handicap at Lewes question has led to nothing, the owner of the second, Sympathy, having determined to let it go, as he himself expressed it, lest he might be considered as actuated by a litigious and querulous spirit, a motive which, however, all who know him would never attribute to him. Runnymede never prescribed a more brilliant spectacle than on Tuesday and Wednesday, the two days of the Egham meeting. The racing on the opening day was interesting in one or two points. Collier Cup was a twenty-fifth Epsom Plate, beating her co-age, Bally Edmund, in such hollow style that the wonder was she was not transferred at 4 to 1 for the Chester Handicap. Nevertheless the old and hackneyed cry of being "forestalled" will have a fresh airing, and the public, being accustomed to believe that the old mare will not be brought out for the event, will discontinue the rush to get on, and thus offset the stable an opportunity of making their investments profitably. Last Lancashire Handicap, too, made a somewhat retrograde movement; but that the like motives actuated those interested in the Sussex horse was not so broadly hinted at. The King John Stakes let in some fresh light upon the recent handling of Anti-Maccassar at Brighton and Lewes, where, it will be remembered, he ran a very moderate horse. He was second in the £100 Plate for two-year-olds, on the Brighton Club day, to Nukuhiwa, who gave him 6 lb. and beat him a length. Mr. Wheeler was not content to ride his jockey, dreading a chance in the "Domesday Book" of the Jockey Club, gave the horse his head, and came out after the race; but one thing is certain, that Anti-Maccassar won so easily, defeating a field of some quality, that he was pronounced to be a good outsider for the Derby. The King John Handicap is looked forward to with unwonted interest in consequence of the reported meeting of Blair Athol and General Peel in the Goodwood Stakes. The latter is supposed to have to carry a 7 lb. penalty, which will make his weight 9 st. 3 lb. Many experienced judges, so called, aver that the Blair Athol and the favourites "together;" while those who affect the belief that the General was not ridden at the finish at Epsom declare that Lord Glasgow's colt will have a glorious revenge, as not only here but in the Leger as well.

The grouse shootings were never taken so readily, or at better prices, than they have been this year; but the deer forests have hung on hand most steadfastly. We hear of only one lot of the best, including a portion of the Forest of Mar, still lack tenants. Some years ago it was calculated that every deer which a tenant killed cost him £50, more according to the number and size of the stags, so that at least a five-pound note may be added. The weather has been most lovely and although we heard sad complaints of the mildness and from parts of Ross-shire as to the effects of two very severe days upon the young birds, there seems a pretty plentiful supply on the great majority of moors. The season makes a heavy work both for dogs and horses. The Duke of Richmond, who has 16½ couple of his Goodwood pack out steadily, has killed upwards of 100 brace of birds 1781, and marched into the city. The British, on that occasion, destroyed quantities of tobacco and burned down all the fences and many wooden buildings for fuel. While General Phillips lay ill of a bilious fever at Bolingbroke House, a private mansion which he had made his head-quarters, the Americans, under General La Fayette, cannonaded the town from Archer's-hill, on the side which is shown in our Engraving, directing their fire particularly against Bolingbroke House, in order to avenge the depredations of the "invaders," so that poor General Phillips—of whom Jefferson said, "he is the proudest man of the proudest nation upon earth"—was conveyed to the cellar for safety, where he exclaimed, "Won't they let me die in peace?" However, not the cannon-ball but the fever terminated his existence, and he was buried in Blandford churchyard. One week later Lord Cornwallis entered the town from Wilmington, on the south, by the same line on which the Federals are now threatening the town; and his Lordship fixed his head-quarters at Bolingbroke House. A great part of Petersburg stands on high ground, much exposed to the fire from neighbouring hills.

THE CHESHIRE VOLUNTEER REVIEW AND SHAM FIGHT.

THE volunteers of the county of Cheshire had a grand field-day on Saturday week, on a piece of ground which is called the Roodee, close to the town of Chester. The local artillery and engineer corps took part in this affair, and its interest was much heightened by the novelty of the programme, which included the throwing of a pontoon bridge across the River Dee by a party of the Birkenhead engineers. Many thousands of spectators watched the proceedings throughout the day. About eighty pontoniers had come from Birkenhead, under the command of Major Hornblower, Captain Campbell (the Adjutant), Captain Thorburn, and Captain Walker, who led the working party. Lieutenant-Colonel Maunsell was the reviewing officer, Captain and Adjutant Costain being his Aide-de-Camp. The spot selected for throwing the pontoon bridge was a few yards below the railway bridge of the Chester and Holyhead line. On the opposite heights, in Curzon Park, among the trees, four heavy guns were planted, commanding the Roodee, and intended to protect the engineers in their retreat. The pontoon bridge was 240 ft. long. It rested upon eleven piers, each pier being formed of seven barrels, the whole lashed to lengths of timber, with a covering of thick planking for the roadway. The piers were constructed in two hours; they were launched in two hours more; and at half-past two o'clock (the operation having waited half an hour for the tide) the Dee was spanned with a pontoon bridge of sufficient strength and width for an army to pass. The structure reflected great credit on both officers and men. At five o'clock 2500 volunteers, besides the artillery and engineers, were on the ground. The 1st Macclesfield Rifles wore a laurel-leaf in their caps, in token of Sergeant Sudlus, of their corps, having won the Lord Lieutenant's cup, value £50, at the prize-meeting at Stetwick. Earl Grosvenor was Brigadier; and the Staff was composed of Lord Feilding, Lieutenant-Colonel Tinley, Major Bousfield, and Captain Wrench. The troops having been put through a number of evolutions, the sham fight commenced, the plan of the operations being as follows:—The artillery and the engineers formed an army for the purpose of attacking Chester; and to accomplish this object they had seized upon the key of the position, which was supposed to be the heights near the railway bridge, where they had planted their heavy guns. The artillery spread along the heights as far as the Grosvenor Bridge, but the defending army (the Rifles) succeeded in turning their flank and driving them back to their original position near the railway bridge. The defending army attempted to cut off the right of the enemy, and for this purpose advanced their skirmishers; but they were stopped by the engineers, who all the time had been concealed behind the river bank, close to the pontoon bridge. An incessant firing was kept up, together with cannonading from the heights. The engineers made an advance, but were gradually driven back to the water's edge, and ultimately crossed the pontoon bridge, hotly pursued by the Rifles, who succeeded in taking the heights. The invading army then marched across the pontoon bridge, as shown in our Illustration, and the party once more reached the Roodee. We are happy to state that not a single accident marred the day's success. Our Engraving is from a sketch by Mr. W. Woods, of Liverpool.

WORKS OF THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

WE have engraved a View, taken from the roof of King's College, adjoining Somerset House, over that portion of the bed of the river and its Middlesex shore which is now occupied by the works of the Thames embankment as far down as Blackfriars Bridge. The principal architectural features in this view—consisting of the bridge, the dome of St. Paul's, the Temple Gardens and Middle Temple Library, the Whitefriars Gasworks, and the Essex-street steam-boat pier—will at once be recognised, even by our most distant readers; but those who have not lately visited London may be surprised to see, in the foreground, what an extensive piece of terra firma has already been artificially added to the site of this great city. The sunken caissons and scaffolding erected in the water, towards the right-hand side of our Engraving, mark the outer line of the intended embankment, along which the low-level sewer will proceed. Below the Temple Gardens and in front of the wharves at Whitefriars it is now proposed to carry the terrace-road upon arches to the abutment of new Blackfriars Bridge, instead of filling up the bed of the river, as in the other portions of the embankment. Our Engraving is from a photograph by Mr. Dawson.

THE HIGHLAND RESIDENCE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

WE are indebted to Dr. Stevcking, one of the Court physicians, for the two Views of Abergeldie Castle which are here engraved. This mansion, which formerly belonged to the Duchess of Kent, and is now the Highland residence of her grandson, the Prince of Wales, stands on the banks of the river Dee, about four miles from Balmoral, from which it may be seen, half-buried in the foliage of the intervening woods. The massive building itself has a rough and simple grandeur, with its overhanging clock-tower, its turrets, and deep-set windows, which give it a lordly and baronial aspect. The noble birch-trees, which abound in this part of Deeside, are celebrated in an old Scotch Song, "The Birks o' Abergeldie," which has been converted by Burns into "The Birks o' Aberfeldie." The name of the place is derived from a burn, or brook, called the Geldie, which here falls into the Dee. The river is now crossed by a neat suspension-bridge, a mile above Abergeldie Castle, as well as by the curious rope-and-cradle bridge which appears in our second Illustration.

NEW MUSIC.

M. GOUNOD'S "MIRELLA" is slowly and surely making way. Built upon a subject rather lyrical than dramatic, the truth of expression is to be found in the motifs, which every additional hearing renders more attractive. Such charming numbers as the Cavatina, the Romance, and the Finale, mounted aloft, on the stalwart, as nearly wingless as possible, "Mirella" follows exactly the same principles as "Faust;" and, although indicated on a subject as different in all respects, in our opinion, quite as genius, and, or we are much mistaken, will, in the long run, be found to be as popular.—Vide "Mirella," Review. The whole of the music may be had (complete) of the kingdom. BOOSEY and Co., Holles-street.

STATUE OF THE LATE DUKE OF BEDFORD AT TAVISTOCK.

THE memorial statue of the late Duke of Bedford, in the Abbey-yard, Tavistock, was uncovered on Wednesday week in the presence of Sir J. Trelawney, M.P., and a number of ladies and gentlemen belonging to that part of the county of Devon. It is a fine work of art, executed by Mr. E. B. Stephens, whose portrait, as one of the four recently-elected associates of the Royal Academy, we engraved last week. The figure, which is of bronze, is 7 ft. in height, and is placed on a granite pedestal 8 ft. in height, both pedestal and statue being composed of materials produced on the Bedford estate. The late Duke is represented in his robes as a Peer, with the insignia of the Order of the Garter. The likeness is a faithful one, and the whole representation is very striking. The work has given great satisfaction to the members of the Bedford family and to the large number of subscribers by whom it was ordered. The pedestal bears the following inscription :—"In honour of Francis, seventh Duke of Bedford." Before uncovering the statue, Mr. Carpenter Garnier made a few remarks on behalf of the people of Tavistock. He said they had erected this memorial in acknowledgment of the debt of gratitude which they owed to the late respected Duke. His Grace succeeded to the dukedom and his vast estates in 1839, and soon became known not only as an able administrator, but as a liberal landlord and a kind friend. He set the example of improving the dwellings of the labourer, and thus greatly advanced the social and moral improvement of the working classes. The continual acts of kindness done for the benefit of that town and neighbourhood—the building of schools, the restoration of the parish church, the new streets, and the new market-place, which has been named still more appropriately after what a friend and benefactor they had lost; but they were now about to inaugurate this statue in the hope that it might keep alive the feelings of love and respect due to him, and hand down the name of Francis, seventh Duke of Bedford, to a remote posterity.

The statue was then uncovered, the 22nd Devon (Tavistock) Rifle Volunteers presented arms and fired, and the band played the National Anthem. Mr. Daw, the portreeve of Tavistock, formally received the statue on behalf of the town. He said their best thanks were also due to Mr. Stephens for the able manner in which the work which he had carried out the wishes of the committee. Mr. E. Straker, as one of the inhabitants of Tavistock, also expressed the feeling of the town on the occasion, and dwelt upon the personal worth of the late Duke, as well as upon the various benefits which he had conferred on that unglorious borough.

The assembly then dispersed, but the day was kept as a holiday in Tavistock, which was crowded with visitors. The 22nd Devon Rifle Volunteers band played at intervals, and in the evening there was a brilliant display of fireworks in the abbey-yard.

TESTIMONIAL TO ADMIRAL SIR A. MILNE.

OUR Engraving represents a handsome piece of plate, which has been manufactured by Messrs. Widdowson and Veale, for presentation to Vice-Admiral Sir A. Milne, K.C.B., as a farewell gift from the inhabitants of Bermuda upon the occasion of his retirement from the naval command of that station. The three figures standing around the stem of the candelabrum are British sailors, in the costume of the period following is the inscription on its base :—"Presented to Vice-Admiral Sir Alexander Milne, K.C.B., Naval Commander-in-Chief of the North American and West India Station, by the inhabitants of Bermuda, on the date of his command on that station, in testimony of their appreciation of his public services and personal character. 1864."

THE MULE AND DONKEY SHOW.

WE present an illustration of the mule and donkey show, which commenced on Tuesday week and terminated on the following day, in the Agricultural Hall, Islington. The object of its promoters was avowedly to encourage an improvement in the breed and treatment and condition of that much-abused best of burden, which is so commonly found in the possession of cruel or careless owners among a portion of the working classes in town or country. The movement has met with the patronage of the Prince of Wales, Earl Clarendon (both of whom were exhibitors of animals), Baron Burdett-Coutts, Mr. Alderman Gurney, M.P., and other distinguished noblemen, ladies, and gentlemen. There were 126 animals exhibited, each of which occupied a separate well-littered stall and was supplied with abundance of pure water. Altogether, this collection of sleek-coated, carefully-groomed, and well-conditioned animals was a pleasant sight for the forsery, Lady V. Cecil's Snowball and Miss C. Garton's Sir Tatton Sykes were awarded the first and second prize for stallions; the latter, however, was withheld. The successful exhibitors of mares were—Mr. Quemby, first; Mr. Robert White, second; and Mr. Dry, third. In the division of the aristocratic ass only two stalls were occupied. The "donkey-ninety-six were "used by the owners in their business," and belonged to that special class for whose improvement the show was instituted. They included a foal three weeks old and a veteran of forty years. The prizes in these classes were awarded much as usual, there being four prizes of £5, £3, £2, and £1 each, and six highly-commended certificates of 5s., to which the Rev. T. Jackson, Rector of Stock Newington, added 10s. to each. The mule class was also divided among the owners of animals that had been kindly treated. The afternoon of each day was devoted to the delivery of prizes and highly amusing. On the Friday the Earl of Harrowby presided over the distribution of the prizes to the costermongers. His Lordship was accompanied by Lieutenant-Colonel Bruce, M.P., Mr. Ferguson, M.P., Mr. S. Gurney, Rev. T. Jackson, and Miss Burdett Coutts. After some appropriate remarks from the noble Earl, the prizes were distributed by the Rev. T. Jackson, who briefly addressed the recipients on the subject of cruelty to animals. The twenty-six-year-old donkey, which comes from St. Giles's, brought his owner an extra prize of a sovereign from the noble president. Cheers were given for Miss Burdett Coutts and the gentlemen who had interested themselves in the show, and for Messrs. Douglas and Sillice, the managers. Some very spirited and laughable trials followed, and concluded the first show of mules and donkeys. We are sorry to state that all the silver cups intended to have been awarded as prizes were stolen on Friday by a man named Thomas Fry, employed by Messrs. Maggin to take charge of them. He removed the plate as he was instructed to do; but instead of taking it to the owner, he sold it to a pawnbroker, absconded, and has not been heard of since.

The class animals represented in our Engraving, which is from a sketch by Mr. B. Hering, are as follow : No. 1, "The Stag," a mule aged five years, belonging to Daniel Sykes, Esq., of Pinner Park farm, Middlesex. No. 2, "Snowball," a donkey, aged five years, belonging to Lady V. Cecil, Burghley House, Stamford. No. 3, An Egyptian donkey, presented by the Pacha of Egypt to the Prince of Wales, for the use of the infant Prince.

THE ARTILLERY EXPERIMENTS AT SHOEBURYNESS.

WE have engraved a general view of the ground at Shoeburyness, where the series of experiments conducted by the Iron-plate Committee of the War Office in order to test the resisting powers of different forms of ship armour was brought to a conclusion on Thursday, the 4th inst. Our front page displays another illustration of the proceedings of that day, when a target built under the superintendence of Professor William Fole, to represent the ordinary construction of the French iron-clad ships of war, or under-water armour, as it was by Sir William Armstrong's large shunt guns, at 200 yards distance, that the small plates of which it was composed were everywhere pierced full of holes, and its timber framework was entirely shattered. The subsequent inspection of this target by the members of the Iron-plate Committee and of the Select Committee on Ordnance, who witnessed these experiments, is the subject of our smaller Engraving. The "La Gloire target," as it has been called, from the French vessel of that name, must here be more exactly described. The object with which it was constructed was to obtain information as to the actual strength of a wooden ship with a plain armour-plate covering, and without any extra strengthening devices, such as the longitudinal stringers, which were lately tried in the Lord Warden and other targets. At the same time, to render the experiment as useful as possible, the committee had taken advantage of it to try the value of some inventions, which, though approved by other nations, and especially by the French, had not hitherto been tested in this country. These were—the use of plates of small size, and a peculiar mode of fastening them to the ship with large "wood screws," holding by coarse threads in the timber, instead of bolts passing entirely through, with nuts on the inside, which is the usual English plan. The target represented a portion of a ship's side, 17 ft. long and 10 ft. high, covered with four rows of plates, each plate being about 3 ft. 9 in. long and 2 ft. 6 in. wide. The two upper rows were 4½ in. thick, the two lower rows 4 in.—that is to say, 9 3/4 in. in all. Each plate was screwed to the ship by about fifteen screws, each 1¼ in. in diameter, and penetrating well into the ship's timbers to the depth of 16 in. The hull was composed of vertical-frame timbers of 16 by 14 in. Within the outside planking of teak, 14 in.; and inside planking of oak again, 6 in., all strongly fastened together. Behind this were portions of decks and deck beams, strengthened in the usual way. Behind the armour-plates, which strengthenings consisted of massive oak brackets, which filled up the angle between the beams and the planks, and, moreover, at intervals of about 3 ft. apart, answering much the same purpose as the iron frames used in our own men-of-war. These, however, appeared to be stronger, were certainly placed closer together, and were, instead of their own strong 2 in. iron bolts, six in number, secured to the deck and the side by two powerful screw-bolts, passing through the frames, though on each side. Every part of the target, in fact, was constructed on the principle in use on the Continent, especially on the French. The whole target—that is to say, its 6 in. plates on the water-line, and 4½ in. plates above—may be said to have represented the last and the best of the French iron-clad frigates, the Heroines; while the upper 4½ in. plates alone—were in most particulars a general copy of La Gloire, the most powerful vessel afloat, except La Gloire and the Flandres. How 6 in. and 4½ in. plates will stand under fire of heavy guns was, of course, well known before the experiment commenced as at its close. The trial, therefore, was particularly undertaken to test the Continental system of small plates fastened with a large number of small screws, and also to test the value of the system of the French, Petin, Gaudet, and Co., of St. Etienne, France. They were of very rich, tough, fine iron. The screws were the screw of the Fowler pattern, is not cut into the substance of the metal, but projects upon the back of the plate, and apparently the whole has been forged in one piece, without employing any separate bolt. The screws were 1¼ in. long and 1½ in. in diameter, so that, as the thickness of the armour-plate was 4½ in., they had a pair of inches of solid iron to screw would go through the outside planking, and enter the frame timbers about 3 in. inches. The screws were said to be numerously about the plates, that at no part could a shot strike without injuring its circumference within two inches of no less than four of them As either system or the other might be preferred by the respective sources of weakness, it was believed that the plates would soon crack under the fire of the guns. The inventor of the screw-fastening, factor of the iron, made by the Millwall Company, disappointed this expectation, for, though the target was penetrated and destroyed to an absolutely extent any target had ever yet been, not one Shoebury, not a single crack was visible in the iron from first to last. There was, however, considerable bulging of the plates between two shots struck within two or three inches of the same spot, and left in many cases in a somewhat quite condition.

The attack upon this target began with the usual preliminary salute of cast-iron shot from the old 68-pounder and the Armstrong 40-pounder. The latter, with a charge of 6 lb. of powder, and a 9 2/2 lb. bore and 12 ins weight, the proper charge of which is 44 lb. But this charge, according to the rules of the experiment, was in this case to be reduced to 30 lb., in order to give, as it is supposed, the same effect at 200 yards range that would be produced at 1500 yards with the full charge and projectile. The 68-pounder, of 95 cwt., weighed down for right-hand corner of the upper middle plate, passed clean through it, splintering the back of the plate, and left a pair of holes. The splinters and the pieces of plate would have done very serious execution against men, but no one was stationed behind the armour of the ship. The next round was to try the effect of Captain Palliser's conical cast-iron shot, which, weighing 68 lb., and of the calibre of 41 lb., the shot being hollow and 258 lb. weight. This struck the smaller plate at the right-hand corner of the target; but when it was aimed at the strongest part of the ship, the left-hand corner of the centre of the massive oak knee, and hurled it some yards behind, scattering the dangerous splinters around. The English shunt gun, of 68-pounder shunt-gun, of 10·5 bore, with a spherical steel shot and a 22½ lb. charge; it struck the centre of the large thick plates, and passed clean through, making a hole of 13 in. by 11 in.

fired from the 68-pounder, with steel spherical shot of 70 lb. against steel thick plates, 4½ in. thick, backed by timber 16 in. thick, and buckling the plate a little. The breech-loader Armstrong 40-pounder, with a 9 2/2 lb. steel shot, was next fired with a charge of 2·6 inches. The smaller shunt-gun (9·22 bore) was now fired at the thicker plates, with precisely the same conditions of shot and charge as before. It struck the centre of the left-hand upper one of the 4½ in. plates. The larger shunt-gun (10·5), fired with a 22½ lb. charge and a spherical steel shot of 95 lb., struck the centre of the plate, and passed through it, smashing the timbers into large splinters, then, after striking the back of the plate, it fell to the ground. The smaller shunt-gun (9·2) was towered to a great height, fell with a tremendous crash about forty yards from the target, and struck the plate at the top. The projectile which was fired at this target was from the large shunt-gun (10·5), with a 25 lb. charge and a spherical steel shot of 95 lb. This struck the corner of one of the thick plates, drove the piece before it, and passed through everything. The target was now in a state of wreck, and through the timbers the daylight could be seen as shot might be planted with any test of its power. The lowest range of plates was left intact, and the upper ones were in such a bursting charge of 11 lb., fired from the 9·22 shunt-gun with a charge of 30 lb. It passed through the plates cleanly in the backing, driving large pieces of the shell and splinters on every side behind the target. To any men who had been there, this would have done more in blowing to pieces the targets already so much shattered. It was, perhaps, having forced its way through so easily, the effect of the shell was not so great as might be. The shot of Palliser's conical cast-iron shots were afterwards fired from the 9·22 in. gun, one of which passed clean through the thinner plate, and, after tearing away the knee, while the other struck the thick plate at its upper left-hand corner, and, breaking the plate, tearing the timber and demolishing one of the large bolts of deal supporting the target.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Autumn Rambles in North Africa. By John Ormsby. (1 vol. Longmans.) The very title of this lively book is a history to the thoughtful. It tells a story of the progress of civilisation, of European energy, and of the wonders wrought by inventive man. For language is used for many purposes besides the original one of conveying our thoughts; its variations mark variations of social condition, and the use of a particular word under particular circumstances is often significant of the rise or decline of nations. Many a holiday excursion of the present day would have been dignified not so very long since by the high-sounding name of "a grand tour." But now familiar terms are applied to journeyings in the most distant countries; men simply ramble in North Africa, stroll in the Sahara, saunter amongst the Arabs, go to "Shiraz in the virgin forest," and to smoke a pipe with the King of Ashantee. Mr. Ormsby speaks of autumn rambles in North Africa as one but a few years ago would have considered autumn rambles in Kent. It is to him but a common vacation-trip to run from Landon to Marseilles to Philippeville to Constantine, from Philippeville to Constantina, from Constantina to Batna, and so on, until he comes to the Atlas, or, literally, according to the blundering schoolboy, crossed the Alps, "on the top of a dilligence," passes his pipe beneath the palm-trees, and with his rifle in his hand has a vision of lions—which he describes subsequently for "lion" throughout the night. But he has yet to earn the title of lion-killer. His fortune was not equal to his patience: he heard the roar, indeed, but his eye was not blest with a glimpse of the king of beasts. Hyænas and jackals were not his chief desire. He sought a knowledge of cities and countries and men and manners, and on all these subjects he has somewhat to say, which he says very well, and which he has illustrated by what appear to us very creditable sketches for an amateur. His descriptions are minute and occasionally very picturesque, and if he is sometimes a little dry when he disputes with Herodotus certain questions of geography, he has decidedly not laid himself open to a general charge of heaviness. His tendency is rather to flippancy, levity, and pertness; but this is great ass his efforts in that direction that many a quaint comparison and many a merry conceit are the result of a process of violent collision. Nevertheless, there is good store of spontaneous humour; and, though we had rather that every man should be funny and pathetic which could be said had already been said upon the subject, we sometimes like the other torments about which travellers or "ramblers" are always eloquent. Mr. Ormsby evidently has a keen sense of humour. He has the merit of having handled that hackneyed theme in a peculiarly happy manner of his own. To the amateur traveller and to the general reader, Mr. Ormsby has an interesting tale to tell; and to those who are neither mountaineers or sportsmen he has facts to relate which they will like to read of. He speaks out candidly the result of his own observation, and does not hesitate to expose what he considers time-honoured errors. For instance, he says that the statement in Father of History, that the horse cannot bear the longest de elements; and, as to the camel, heretofore believed to be a model of patience and content, he says, "Esthen speaks of 'the gentle, womanish ways' of the camel; and there is one trait in its character to which he does not allude, and which is certainly not womanish—namely, ill-nature. I may feel inclined to call it womanish. The camel is about the most unreasonable animal in existence. He is not satisfying if, by complaining just as loudly against lying down as against rising up—just as bitterly against being relieved of its burden as against being loaded; and when, passing a camel, you hear it making these sad hideous with its pevish nose, you may be sure its master is doing all he can to make it comfortable." Mr. Ormsby has undoubtedly a fair claim to be considered a man of observation and acuteness, and he has evidently a keen sense of humour; and, though we do not hesitate to avow that we consider his time-honoured errors. For instance, he says that the camel is no Father of History; that the horse cannot bear the longest de elements; and, as to the camel, heretofore believed to be a model of patience and content, he says, "Esthen speaks of 'the gentle, womanish ways' of the camel; and there is one trait in its character to which he does not allude, and which is certainly not womanish—namely, ill-nature. For instance, he says that the statement in his book to be read, not so much on account of its literary merits as for the interest felt in, and the cordiality always displayed towards the author. Its style bears traces of the author's profession and of his peculiar place in the profession; it is of the rollicking description; it abounds in anecdotes more or less funny; and it will fulfil the wish he expresses—that it "may be the medium of passing a weary half hour agreeably, either by rail or boat."

Society of Engineers: Transactions for 1863. (1 vol. E. and F. Spon.) Well-wishers to this society, established in May, 1854, have here an opportunity of reading seven papers on highly important subjects, by competent writers. The value of the papers is enhanced by numerous diagrams, and the discussions to which the papers led are appended, so that the volume gives the reader the means of observing opinion with opinion, and of arriving at a satisfactory conclusion by balancing conflicting sentiments in the scales of his own judgment.

Captain Andrew Clarke, R.E., has been appointed Director of Engineering and Architecture in the place of Colonel Greene.

The intention of the Horse Guards to make the Military Train a non-purchase corps has been officially announced to the Commandant. The vested interests of the present officers will be preserved.

The Lords of the Admiralty last week visited Cork, where a banquet was given in their honour. Subsequently they visited the governmental establishments in Devonport Arsenal. This week their Lordships meet the annual examination of Portsmouth Dockyard.

Earl De Grey, the Minister of War, arrived at Portsmouth on Monday in order to make an inspection of the new fortifications of that harbour. The Earl Russell was accompanied over the works by the officers of the various royal departments connected with the defences.

On Tuesday the most important of all the many important experiments at Shoeburyness took place. The 600-pounder gun was first mounted. Nothing larger made of iron has ever been fired in England. It is intended to fire at a range of 2000 yards, but, with a view to secure accuracy, the firing took place at 600 yards. The shell that was fired was intended to be demolished it, and would have made any ship afloat it might take effect upon. It was the universal opinion that the experiment would be a fatal one to the iron-clad ship that could be built.

By the death of Lieutenant-General Sir John Rowland Dunster, K.B., a vacancy for distinguished or meritorious services is placed in the gift of the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief.—The death of Captain the Hon. Arthur Annesley, R.N., leaves the Earldom of Mountnorris to his younger brother, Colonel the Hon. E. Gordon Douglas Pennant, in Halkin-street, Belgrave-square. He was born Jan. 12, 1819, and entered the commission as Lieutenant in February, 1843, and as Commander, Nov. 20, 1852, since which he has not been employed. His present gunboat service is limited to a month in the retired list April 1, 1856.

The Board of Naval Architecture, under the control of the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education, in conjunction with the Admiralty, will be opened, at South Kensington, on the 1st proximo. The school is for the instruction not only of Admiralty pupils from the Royal Dockyards and officers of the Royal Navy, but also for the use of naval architects and shipbuilders in wood and iron, marine engineers, foremen of works, draftsmen, &c., in public practice. Mr. W. J. Macquorn Rankine, LL.D., of St. John's College, Cambridge, Principal of the School of Naval Architecture, has returned to the country after a visit to the establishments of the Admiralty, Inspector-General and Director of Studies; and Mr. C. W. Merrifield, F.R.S., Principal of the School.

Her Majesty has conferred the Victoria Cross on Lieutenant-Colonel James Cornelius M'Neill, on account of distinguished service in New Zealand. When proceeding to the assistance of a party of the 65th Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel M'Neill, who was accompanied by two privates—who suddenly came upon an unexpected body of the enemy, the latter officer had his sword broken by being struck on the hilt, and, at the other soldier, was recommitting, when they were attacked, and the latter officer was severely wounded in the face, each receiving a bayonet thrust. Lieutenant-Colonel M'Neill, having his rifle at the mercy of the advancing soldier, caught the bayonet, and, having both returned to the ordinary position of a soldier, caught the horse, seized the man in mount, and by this courageous act saved his life, and succeeded in capturing his man.

On Monday afternoon the sappers and miners of the Royal Engineers at Chatham were engaged in siege operations, having for their object the destruction of a block of chalk and earth on the banks of the Medway, at Cuxton, near Rochester. Four shafts were sunk in the rock, varying in depth from 45 ft. to 52 ft., and were communicated with by the use of galleries, in which the powder was deposited. The charges were contained in the mass, each holding 1000lb., and the total weight of the charges of powder was nearly 4000lb. weight. The necessary operations of "tamping," &c., having been completed, the wires of the galvanic apparatus communicated fired by means of the voltaic battery. The surface of the cliff bulged outward, the whole resting on the chalk formation—a fallure here of such and chalk being thus displaced. The operations were highly successful.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The inquest on the body of the Guardsman Cooper, who was shot at Wimbledon while acting as marker at the meeting of the National Rifle Association, was brought to a close on Saturday last, when the verdict of "Homicide by misadventure," accompanying it with an opinion that Sergeant-Major Sheffield was free from all blame.

Among the new regulations issued to the volunteer force was one authorising all "officials" to wear a distinguishing mark on the left arm. Lord Hartington has issued the following circular on the subject to each volunteer commanding officer:—"Sir,—Inquiry having been frequently having observed a deviation, in many cases, from the form of badge authorised to be worn by volunteers as a mark of their official position, I am directed by Earl De Grey and Ripon to call your attention to article 67 of the Volunteer Regulations, and to state that the badge which alone should consist of a ring of silver lace round the sleeve of the right arm, above the cuff, pointing any other lace or ornament whatever, and that the ring should be plain, and should not be made in the form of a chevron." The badge has been worn in this form for many corps, and it is desirable that it should be so made to a ring.

The annual prize competitions of the St. George's corps took place on Saturday last at the butts on Wormwood-scrubs. The shooting was distinguished by several novel features. A prize of £15, given by Lord Vernon, was competed for by the men of the corps at 400 yards, with the eight of concentric circles. The target was divided into increasing circles, described from the centre, the innermost being the bull's-eye, and the outermost, or outer, being the value, the former to count five, the latter one. The lowest score was to take the prize, to which five others were added for the next lowest scores. The prize-winners were Mr. Thomas Bull, 4; Crooke, Mr. Pouncey, Mr. Henery, Mr. M'Kenzie, and Mr. Hodgkinson, 5 each. Another challenge plate was competed for at the Wimbledon (Infield) range and targets, as the St. George's challenge cup, value 100 gs., carrying with it the regimental gold medal; the ladies' challenge plate, value 100 gs., carrying with it the regimental silver medal; and Messrs. Ortner and Meade's silver challenge shield, carrying with it-an electrotype facsimile. These were competitively won by Ensign A. Crooke, Private Andrews, Lieutenant Hall, Captain Peel (after shooting a tie with several others). The regimental prizes, twenty-six in number, comprising silver cups and flasks to the value of £150, were competed for, and the topmost scores were made by Private Blaise, Private W. Smith, Private Pitts, and Private W. L. Hind, who had their choice of the prizes. No. 3 company won the volley-firing prize. The last prizes were contained in a very large packing-case, and were termed "unknown prizes," as they were to be kept secret until won. These were competed for as "consolation prizes" by those who had won nothing. When the case was opened it was found to contain articles of value, such as framed pictures, mouse-trap pipes, boxes of cigars, a very valuable portable chair, shaving-glasses, and other numerous prizes, being a box of everything which was to be consumed on the ground. All the prizes were at once distributed, and the proceedings terminated to the great satisfaction of all.

The prize-shooting of the 21st Middlesex (Civil Service) was brought to a close at Wimbledon on Saturday last. The challenge cup, value 100 guineas, was won by Private Harrison, with the extraordinary score of 75 points, Private Harries; and the first battalion prize of £10 for marksmanship by the best shot in each company was won by Private Cornish, of the Hendon company, on Tuesday and Thursday last week. In the first series of prizes Sergeant-Major Chatham, the Duke of Cambridge's challenge cup was won by Ensign Gripper in shooting off the tie. Mr. Gripper, who won the second prize, is a frequent competitor in rifle matches, another prize, and last year won the Queen's prize at Wimbledon. Private Trifford Jones (263), and Private D. Cowan (1), were the only challenge cup winners who shot for the second time. Since, this winner to have final possession of it. Two more shots at each succeeding meeting of the prize, which was won by Ensign Gripper, who has consequently presented the cup to the company, will again put it up for competition. The second series included prizes of £4 and £2, were carried off by Corporal B. Humphrey, and Private J. J. Eckstein. Captain Willis's prize, a silver cup, was also won in this competition by Corporal Humphrey, who made the best score at 500 yards and six consecutive bull's-eyes. Ensign Gripper was ultimately the winner.

At the annual battalion and company prize-firing of the 26th Middlesex (Cripplegate) the shooting took place on two days on Harrow Hill. The regimental prizes of £9 and £6 were won by Private Hillary and Sergeant Hutchinson, the shooting-ties having been won by Private Hillary. A silver watch, value 10 guineas, presented by Sir Minto Townend Farquhar, M.P., was won by Private Hillary, who made the best score at 500 yards. Mr. J. Curtis, to be competed for by the twenty best attendants at drill, was won by Private Hillary.

The 7th Surrey, which is commanded by Major Beresford, was inspected last week by the Colonel Commandant, Lord Lieutenant Evelyn, ton-lane. The number present and absent with leave made up an effective strength of about 300 men. The inspection took place in the presence of the usual light infantry movements, and the inspecting officer, in addressing the corps, expressed his satisfaction at finding it in so high a state of order. He warned the members not to imagine that volley and file firing was better for being quicker, and that the Queen's prize at Wimbledon was not to be won by shoot themselves to be well drilled, and he should make a favourable report to the War Office. At the conclusion of the movements the men fell in in lines and the privates of the regiment, presented Major Beresford with a splendid testimonial of respect, and in recognition of the gallant gentleman's services to the regiment.

The annual carbine prize-contest of the 9th Kent (Plumstead) Volunteers took place on Saturday, at the range, the Common, Plumstead common. The first prize, a subscription silver cup, was won by Gunner Brown, and the second prize by Sergeant Bayley. The other prizes and the other prizes was postponed.—The third competition for the new challenge cup of the 5th Lancashire Volunteers took place on Monday, at the Fleetwood rifle-meeting, after a close contest, in a tie between Private F. Dean and Private Dean taking the second prize.

The first annual prize-meeting of the Cinque Ports Volunteer Artillery, comprising the corps of Dover, Folkestone, Ramsgate, Sandwich, Deal, Walmer, Hythe, Rye, Winchelsea, and Margate, at Shorncliffe Palisperton, as Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, is president, took place on Tuesday week, and was attended by a large number of the corps and visitors. The prizes were presented by Colonel Harcourt, who was in command. The first prize was the Lord Warden's prize of £20 and a bronze medal; the Sandwich Artillery; the second prize (£20 and a bronze medal) by No. 2 detachment, Deal Artillery; the third prize (£10 and a silver medal) by the second detachment, No. 2 B, Dover. Lady Harcourt presented the prizes.

The 1st Hants Administrative Battalion, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Humphrey, M.P., and which is formed of the companies commanded by Captain Hall, Southampton; Captain Hall, Alresford, were officially inspected last week by Colonel Lnard, the Assistant Adjutant-General for the district, and Colonel Lord Bury, C.B., at Andover, the seat of their commanding officer. The drill lasted two hours, during which time the men were put through the usual battalion and light infantry movements. At the conclusion of the review the battalion marched past the inspecting officer, and Colonel Lnard expressed himself as he had been very much gratified by the manner in which they had regulated they had done. He should report to the commander-in-chief and to the War Office. He also congratulated them on the efficiency of their Colonel. The battalion then marched to the regimental quarters, and were dismissed for the day. Lord Bury subsequently observing that it was the only assembler-like thing they had done. The battalion, which numbers about 500 men, assembled on Monday week for battalion, officers and men, at a sumptuous dinner, which was served under a marquee in the grounds of the commanding officer.

LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE O'CONNELL MONUMENT IN SACKVILLE-STREET, DUBLIN.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE O'CONNELL MONUMENT IN DUBLIN.

THE first stone of the monument intended to be raised to the memory of Daniel O'Connell was laid on Monday week, by the Lord Mayor of Dublin, in Sackville-street, on the site granted for that purpose by the Dublin Corporation. From the earliest hour in the morning the streets of Dublin were thronged with persons wearing green sashes and rosettes, and every point from which a view of the procession could be obtained was crowded with spectators. Business was, for this and party, suspended during the day. The people were all in holiday dress, and seemed, generally, to be respectable and well-behaved. The railways brought up large numbers of visitors during the morning, and several municipal bodies representing various country towns. In the procession, which started at noon from St. Stephen's-green and passed through the principal streets to Sackville-street, the associated trades took the lead. About one o'clock the City Hall was passed by the first banner, which was green, bearing a "Memory of O'Connell, the Immortal Liberator." The band which followed this banner played a solemn air. Nearly every man in the procession wore a piece of green, sometimes intermingled with white. The sectional banners which appeared all bore the harp and cross. Corrigans and sons, with next heavy various patriotic or party banners, preceded the train of the various trades and handicrafts. It has not yet been decided to whom the execution of the statue should be intrusted, and this fact was alluded to by the words inscribed on the flag, "Home Artists," and "Encourage Native Sculptors," in the three layers that graced a picture of the Bank of Ireland, formerly the Parliament House, with the inscription, "Our Old House at Home," surmounted by a harp. In another flag was, "Stand together, brothers all," and "Oh, for the Swords of former days," with a man bearing a pike, and a round tower in the background. Various Catholic societies and benefit societies, under the patronage of St. Vincent de Paul, next appeared, bearing lapels and gilt batons and crosses, with a great pictorial flag of O'Connell and Pope Pius, one on each side of a harp, and with seven large flags of provincial societies, followed by a picture of the Saviour on the Good Shepherd. The fantastic costumes of the societies of the Oddfellows and the Foresters were set off by the sober appearance of the ecclesiastical body of the procession. The latter, however, preceded by the boys from various Roman Catholic charitable schools, by the children of the Dr. Spratt's Orphanage, and by several of the Catholic religious societies. A person wearing the Irish harper, dressed in antique costume, with a harp mustrung and silent, appeared in a coach, over which waved several pictorial flags with Erin weeping at O'Connell's urn, and some portraits, apparently of bishops, with mitres and crosiers. The Catholic clergy, seminarists and orders, and a double rank of seventy-two priests, followed by fourteen prelates in their robes of office, the Roman Catholic Primate, Dr. Dixon, and Archbishop Leahy and Leahy were among them. Next came a sort of portable hustings, 30 ft. high, with two large "mail chairs rear it for the speakers. On the top was the "Blessed Virgin Mary" bore a large religious banner. A number of trade societies next appeared, and a remarkable number of them rode upon a sorry horse. The procession was continued by the officers of the Corporation, the mace-bearer and the City Marshal, the Lord Mayor's secretary, and the Lord Mayor himself, in his state coach, drawn by six horses and supported by the beefeaters. The aldermen and town councillors followed in their private carriages. The display of enthusiasm was manifested throughout the procession, and the applause was greatly increased, even when the stone appeared, on a platform some twenty feet from the ground, drawn by eight horses and surmounted by two stalwart masons in green sashes.

At length the four chisels of the Lord Mayor and members of the Dublin Corporation, with other municipal dignitaries, ascended the platform when the architect's plan of the statue was to be laid. There were also present Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Q.C., M.P.; Mr. Napoleon Cullen (Dublin), and Lesby Cullen; and the Roman Catholic Bishop of Kerry (Moriarty), Butler (Limerick), Gilhooley (Elphin), O'Hea (Ross), Conner and Brady, of West Australia. A large number of the Roman Catholic priests were on the platform. Sir John Gray read an address to the Lord Mayor, in the name of the monument committee, which stated that the people of Ireland had met in their thousands, and with matchless genius won emancipation, and whose fearless hand struck off the fetters which for ages had disgraced a nation, was held in bondage in their own land. The Irish people had that day cast off the hopelessness of despair and rejoiced in their return to the active duties of national existence by rendering grateful homage to O'Connell, who had inspired a nation of bondmen with the will, and taught them the way, to be free. The address concluded by saying that the stone "might be laid by the Lord Mayor, one to whom O'Connell had opened the portals of the Corporation, so long closed against every Catholic, and who was related by blood to the Liberator and thoroughly identified with his principles." (The Lord Mayor) had been born a slave. O'Connell had made him free. His position was an exalted one; let him use that position as became the disciple, the admirer, the successor in office of O'Connell. Let him (the Lord Mayor) endeavour to learn wisdom from the past, to lay down their differences at the foot of that monument, actuated by the spirit of Counsell, to unite, in his name, for the regeneration of their elevation, honour, and the glory of his and their fatherland. The Lord Mayor replied in a few brief strain. Some incidents in the life of the wrath of "Ireland's greatest son" he said he was proud of the function assigned to him that day, and he hoped that the first stone of to-day's memorable and truly national demonstration should promote the union of all classes—if the demon of discord should henceforth be exorcised and driven from their island. Mutual confidence, union, and harmony be restored. That result, if attained, would be the most striking as well as the most acceptable tribute that could be paid to the memory, the genius, and the glory of their departed chief, the immortal O'Connell.

The mallet and trowel were then presented to the Lord Mayor for the purpose of laying the stone, which his Lordship did with the usual formalities, and the preceding inscription. The trowel, mallet, and blade—were composed of gold silver, and bore the following inscription:—"Presented by the Committee to the O'Connell Monument Fund, to the Right Hon. Peter Paul M'Swiney, Lord Mayor of Dublin, upon the occasion of his laying the first stone of the monument, on the 8th of August, 1864. Trustees—Sir John Gray, Charles Hamilton; D. J. Corrigan, President of the College of Physicians; Alderman John Reynolds, Alderman Meyler, Alderman Alexander, Alderman Dillon, Alderman Dillon, John Reilly, the Rev. J. O'Hanlon, W. J. Henry, Secretary and Committee—The Rev. Dr. Spratt, the Rev. Dr. Gillespie, the Rev. J. O'Hanlon; Michael Murphy, T.C.; James Hughes; R. J. Devitt, T.C.; James M'Donnell, James Delany, Michael O'Brien, Patrick M'Namee, Secretary to the Committee—Alderman Dillon, John William L. Hackett, Martin Crean." The mallet is of bog-oak, ornamented with shamrocks, round lower, harp, and wolf-dog. It bears the following inscription:—"This mallet, used by the Right Hon. Paul M'Swiney, Lord Mayor of Dublin, in laying the foundation-stone of the national monument to O'Connell, on the 8th of August, 1864, is presented by the ceremonial committee to Sir John Gray, Kt.," to mark their sense of the vast services rendered by him in originating, promoting, and carrying to the advent of its completion this great national monument of Ireland's gratitude to her greatest son—the immortal Liberator."

THE BRITISH ARCHÆOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION.

DURING last week the Association held its twenty-first annual meeting, this year taking for the first time Ipswich; with excursions to places of antiquarian and historical interest in the county of Suffolk. The president was George Tomline, Esq., M.P., F.S.A. Many of the visitors were accompanied by ladies, who continued with the party throughout the week and proceeded on the several excursions.

The meeting was preceded by Ipswich, the proceedings commencing with the reception of the association by the Mayor and Corporation at the Council Chamber, Tuesday. Lord Henniker, the President of the Association, being unable to be present to resign that office, the duty devolved upon Mr. Pettigrew, the Honorary Secretary of the Institute. Mr. Tomline took the chair. The chairman acknowledged the welcome given to the association on behalf of the town, and spoke briefly on the antiquities. He regretted that the speaking archæologically, to the kingdom of East Anglia, among the descendants of the Icenes.—Upon the motion of Mr. Wodehouse, M.P., Arnold, M.P., seconded by Mr. George Godwin, a vote of thanks to the president for the opening address, and to the Mayor and Corporation before the meeting, was carried. Mr. Pettigrew read the programme of the day, the Mayor directed attention to the old decking which hung from the roof, and the meeting then broke up.

The party first examined the ancient MSS. and illuminated works belonging to the Corporation, which were kept in a glass case, sometimes interchanged with white. The sectional banners which appeared all bore the harp and cross. Corrigans and sons, with next heavy various patriotic or party banners, preceded the train of the various trades and handicrafts. It has not yet been decided to whom the execution of the statue should be intrusted, and this fact was alluded to by the words inscribed on the flag, "Home Artists," and "Encourage Native Sculptors," in the three layers that graced a picture of the Bank of Ireland, formerly the Parliament House, with the inscription, "Our Old House at Home," surmounted by a harp. In the evening of the same day a banquet took place at the Rotundo, at which the Lord Mayor presided.

The party then entered to Ipswich, and started for Orwell Park, Nacton, the seat of the president to Ipswich, and visited Orwell Park, Nacton mansion, with its fine collection of pictures, the visitors enjoyed a ramble in the park, and then partook of luncheon. Afterwards the party proceeded to Woodbridge, company crossing the Deben by Pettigrew, in a graceful address, thanked the president for his splendid hospitality. The party then crossed the bridge, and, having entered, and Woodbridge, and the Ladies." The company then enjoyed themselves for another hour or two, and then returned to Ipswich, and the day's proceedings terminated. On Wednesday the party were received to hold the congress next year at Durham. Mr. Godwin then read a paper on the Architectural Remains of Eastern Counties of England. The form of those of Suffolk and Norfolk he referred to the difficulty of getting stones to them, and the consequent frequent use of brick as a substitute of good building-stone; they had been referred to the Danes; it had been suggested they were Anglo-Saxon; but they were doubtless Danish; but Dr. George Peterborough considered the round towers of Christian origin. Mr. Hills had examined and carefully copied every round tower in the fact of there being no disturbance in the habits of the Irish people caused by a foreign occupation (as in the case of the occupation of Normandy and the conquest by the Danes) Mr. Hills referred the architecture of the early Irish not being marked by any peculiar form as in England.

Votes of thanks were then accorded by acclamation to the Mayor and Corporation of Ipswich, to the local archæologists who had assisted at the congress, and to the president.

The programme proposed for Saturday an excursion to Sudbury, thence to Long Melford, Lavenham, and Hadleigh, and a visit to Little Wenham Hall and church. The members of the Association, however, seemed to be exhausted with their five days' work, and so few put down their names for Saturday's excursion that the plan was abandoned, and the archæologists agreed that the antiquities of Ipswich should be further examined. Accordingly, the Museum was revisited, and, under the guidance of Mr. Pulleyn and Mr. Roberts, some of the churches were inspected. On St. Nicholas Church some relics of sculptures were pointed out, on the wall, which Mr. Roberts pronounced to be decidedly of Saxon character.

It was this re-exploration closed the proceedings of the Congress, which in its results has contributed much to the promotion of the objects of the Archæological Association, in cherishing veneration for the past.

Baron Bentinck and Sir John Bowring exchanged at the Netherlands Legation the ratifications of a reciprocal Treaty of Friendship and Commerce between the Dutch and the Hawaiian Governments.

He was, in 1859, one of the Clyde trustees, in which capacity he, along with his colleagues, executed magnificent improvements in the navigation of that noble river. Two years later he became a member of the Town Council. On the union, in 1862, of Hamilton, Rutherglen, and part of the Clyde, Mr. Hastie was elected Lord Provost of, and went the following year to Parliament as one of the representatives for, Glasgow. Mr. Hastie belonged to the liberal school of politics. He was in favour of an extension of the franchise, though his views were not considered sufficiently advanced by many of the electors of Glasgow in 1857, when he ceased to represent that city. He was a warm friend of Lord Palmerston's Government, and in 1859 its nominee of foreign questions. There were, however, some parts of that Government's domestic policy to which he was not entirely favourable, and more than once he objected to the Ministerial conduct on the Reform question, the paper duty, and free investments, etc. Mr. Hastie was a man of religious principle, and took an influential member of the United Presbyterian denomination, and, by the liberality of his contributions, always supported the cause of religion and education. He married Anne, eldest daughter of Robert Napier, Esq., of West Shandon, in the county of Dunbarton.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Sir Christopher Wm. Bethel Codrington, Bart., M.P., of Dodington Park, Gloucestershire, was proved on the 7th instant. It bears date 1861, and a codicil is added, dated June 22, 1864. Sir Christopher has bequeathed to his relict, Lady Georgiana Anne Codrington, daughter of the seventh Duke of Beaufort, the whole of his property, her own settlement and the universal legacies under the will of her father, the late marquis, in his fourteenth year.

The will of Sir Francis Edward Scott, Bart., of Great Barr Hall, Staffordshire, was proved in London, on the 30th ult., by the executors, the Hon. Charles Scott Forrester, M.P., and Henry Hawkins, Esq. The property was sworn under £60,000. The will bears date Nov. 18, 1863, and was attested by Mr. Benjamin B. C. Hawkins, Henry Bott, and Mr. Thomas Clerk and M. D. of Lessards. The testator died three days after, at St. Leonards-on-Sea, in the age of fifty-seven. Sir Francis married, 1st, Adelaide Anne, daughter of Sir William Hartopp, Bart. It is a singular circumstance that two distinct baronetcies—those of Scott and Hartopp—have both created in 1806, met in the person of the late Baronet, who succeeded to the Hartopp baronetcy 1834, and to that of Scott in 1847. Sir Francis was the eldest son of the late Sir E. Scott, Bart., by Catherine Jullens, eldest daughter and co-heiress of the late Sir Hugh Bateman, Bart. By the will he bequeathed to his relict an annuity of £300 beyond her marriage under settlement. To his eldest son (a minor) he has devised his real estate and the residue of the personalty. To his younger son and three daughters he leaves legacies of £2000 each. The remainder has bequeathed his collection of books to the Midland Institute, in Birmingham, together with the sum of £50 to purchase any other or volumes that may be required.

The will of Martin Thackeray, Esq., of Gloucester-place, Portman-square, late general in the London Guards, and Mr. Field, executors, Augusta Thackeray, the relict, and Charles De La Pryme, Esq., the younger. The personalty was sworn under £25,000. The testator was for many years Vice-Provost of King's College, University of Cambridge. Upon the decease of his widow the property is bequeathed to his only child, and engravings, in testimony of his grateful remembrance of the obligations received by him from the bounty of King George VI., and his anxious desire to promote the study of social and useful learning amongst the scholars of that college founded by his Majesty. He charges £1000, the sum of £4000, the dividends to be given to the scholar of King's College educated at Eton for foundation at. Eton school, on the foundation at Eton for Bachelor of Arts, have taken the highest degree amongst the Wranglers in the mathematical tripos, the testator bequeaths £500. This bequest, and the legacies to the college, are to be paid free of duty.

A recent report of the Registrar-General shows that 32·7 per cent of the male minors who married in 1861 were obliged to sign the register with marks. This proportion diminished year by year till 1861, when it was 27·7. The progress of education amongst women has been still more gratifying. In 1861 48·8 per cent of minors were unable to write their names; but in 1862 there were only 28·8 per cent in this predicament. The proportion of illegitimate to the total number of births decreased from 7·69 per cent in 1860 to 6·91 per cent in 1861.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

H. A. B., Bristol.—The attack in both is carried on with much skill and spirit. Were the defence working hand with hand it would be a difficult matter to win. We have seen examples in which the first player is better matched. 2. Get as much good practice as possible, and, concerning, go, you will be the best person you can control.

R. C., Adelaide, Australia.—The establishment of a chess club in Adelaide will, no doubt, be hailed by the members of your pleasant city as a most desirable addition to its list of institutions. It is quite unusual to receive so many communications, by the same mail, as you have sent before. 2. The matter of the paper you inquire about can be obtained at the ordinary cost from the publisher.

W. S. Kenilworth.—Your letter has been published any game lately illustrative of the variation?

MATCH DE LAZARUS.—The consultation shall be examined and a report of them given very shortly.

A. D. L., Beckenham-on-Mere.—We have again examined the enigma, and find them, as we said before, a most elaborate failure in your first efforts.

J. Q. W. Bristol.—Your solution of No. 1,069 is correct. 2. Q to R 8th, White obviously replies with 2. Q to Q R 5th (ch), &c. If by anticipation on the part of the complainer, the Bishop takes P, Black will play to R 6th, and mate is announced. The Enigma by I. Muller, in the Paper of that date, should have been No. 1,070, instead of 1,068; and the solution of the latter should be Kt to Q 4th. 3. Mr. Bird's Defence to the Queen's Gambit has indeed given much trouble, and has shocked the fact in Mr. Boyce's Enigma that Black can obtain a draw by taking the Pawn.

THE THEATRES.

A new farce, or rather a sort of extravaganza so called, written by Messrs. W. Brough and Halliday, and entitled "The Actors Retreat," was produced at the Adelphi on Thursday week. It raises, in fact, to the Dramatic College, and is intended for an allegorical advertisement of its benefits and claims. Mr. Toole sustains the principal part, and appears in his own proper person as wearied with rehearsal-work and disgusted with the position he holds on the boards. He dislikes to be called a low comedian, and aspires to tragic honours. Let be talk asleep and has a vision. He is transported to a gipsy encampment, where the members of the gang bear a strange resemblance to those of the Adelphi company, and among these he suffers many difficulties and perils. He is robbed and made to marry Gipsy Jane (Mrs. Mellon), then he himself takes to purloining, and has to be disguised as an old woman to escape the consequences. Awaking, he then becomes his better genius, and gives him a sight of the college as affording a better termination to the actor's career than the one likely to close him on the gipsy encampment. He had, he wishes, but to say he find himself on the green-room sofa, better satisfied with the condition of things than before his fall asleep. All did their best for this dramatic trifle, which was moderately successful.

The last night (Friday week) of the season at St. James's was distinguished by the production of a new piece from the pen of Mr. Arthur Sketchley, with which we believe it is the intention of the management that the theatre shall remain closed. The piece is entitled "How Will They Get Out of It?" and it is very well fitted for Mr. and Mrs. G. Mathews and the other light comedians at this house. Percy Wylding (Mr. G. Mathews) has married Emma his wife as a neighbour of Major and old Mrs. Oldfield (Mr. and Mrs. Frank Matthews). Mr. Wylding's single blessedness is over, and as such pays a visit to the Oldfields, where she encounters Percy. Both, however, contrive to keep the secret, and he retains his bachelor rooms of Tiverton. There also they meet Harry Egerton (Mr. F. Robinson), who, in the character of a young widower, has made a runaway match with Alice (Mrs. G. Mathews), the Major's daughter. The disappointed couple are forgiven, but a terrible perplexity awaits them from certain inharmonies afforded by the lodgings (their respective bachelor ones). Percy had been the means of saving a lady on board a Mediterranean steamer from drowning, and this lady is supposed for the time to have been Egerton's wife, and the latter, on his part, is supposed to have grown jealous of Mrs. Wylding. Our tricky week these trials were concluded, and the four players, somewhat suddenly separated to his rest. Mr. Robson was originally intended for an engraver, but private theatricals have for a long time given a certain zest to his life, and twenty-three we find him a regular actor at the Grecian (1844), whose he remained five years. He then acted in Dublin for three years, and was a prodigious favourite there. In 1852 he was engaged by him for the Olympic, where, as actor and manager, he continued to the day of his death. His performance of Sam Gerridge and his performance of Jeremiah in "Plot and Passion" will be remembered by all playgoers as having established his reputation, both as a burlesque actor and a high comedian. His method was always excellent—end in all his parts the presence of genius was indispensable. He had numerous tragic parts assigned to him in the Olympic burlesques, among Mr. Robson died in his forty-third year. His funeral took place at Norwood Cemetery on Wednesday.

SCENE AT HORNCASTLE HORSE FAIR.

THE small town of Horncastle, in Lincolnshire, presents a very lively and busy appearance on the days of the annual fair, which are such as one of the most important held in this country. We have engraved a sketch of the principal street as it appeared for several days last week during the business of the fair. It is a large assemblage of agriculturists and amateur horsedealers and horsebreeders, owners of coaches and omnibuses, and others who have occasion to keep good carriage-horses, and cavalry remount agents, were frequently sent on this occasion. There was a considerable number of horses, both thoroughbred and draught cattle. Superior animals for private carriages sold well, and hunters made high prices. Strong, thick-set, active horses, suitable for town work, were in demand. Cobs, ponies, and light-legged horses for public conveyances, 50 gs. to 40 gs. Well-built horses for the cavalry and military work, and for army contractors at full rates. Many of this class of horses were selected from Irish breeds. Heavy cart horses, for town and agricultural work, realised 60 gs. to 90 gs.; and the prices for roadwork and agricultural purposes were matched at 60 gs. to 70 gs.; aged cart horses, 16 gs. to 22 gs.; and colts and fillies, 30 gs. Good thoroughbred cattle for park riding or ladies' saddle, 90 gs. to 140 gs.; neat cover hacks and clever cobs, 40 gs.; handsome well-matched carriage ditto, 50 gs.; harness cobs and neat ponies, 16 gs. to 30 gs. Hunters, young horses of pedigree, and ditto of Irish blood, 70 gs. to 90 gs.; and hunters of exceptional power and pedigree and performance would and staying qualities, 110 to 200 gs. and upwards; while some horses were privately purchased at prices ranging from 300 gs. upwards, recorded among breeders in brood mares, yearlings, and young blood stock.

A Royal decree has confirmed the nomination of the Royal Society of Naples of Professor Sylvester, of Woolwich, to one of the eight foreign members of the Academy of Physical and Mathematical Sciences.

INTERESTING DISCOVERY ON THE CONSTANTINOPLE WALLS.—A correspondent of the Times writes from Constantinople:—"An accidental fire which took place in the Turkish quarter has led to a most interesting and significant discovery, by clearing away a mass of houses which had concealed an important ancient gate. The gate is situated in the Valley of Lycus, between the Coronation Hall of the Emperors from the time of Heraclius downward. It stands at the extremity of the valley, and near the south-east angle of the city, and on the spot where the wall of Heraclius (with which this building was plainly contemporary) joins the Theodosian wall. The gate is built of the finest open the inner of the two walls of Theodosius, and the other masonry of Theodosius's wall is of inferior quality. The later structure has destroyed the pillars and, indeed, all the marble and ornamental work of the lower structure have been carried away by fire; but the fine, solid masonry is still recognised in the elegance of its proportions, and in that indefinable impression which belongs to many of the fragments of ancient art, even in the last stages of their decay. Dr. Dethier has just brought to me a book which I have never seen before, and which is the once famous but long-lost library of Matthias Corvinus, King of Hungary. For more than a century this royal library had completely disappeared, but a few years since a hope was confidently suggested that a considerable portion of it would be found in the Seraglio at Constantinople. The expectation, which was believed to contain spoils of more than one library of the West. Dr. Dethier then the book and MSS. which I have seen, and which he found in the library to be ninety-six. Of these, only sixteen can with certainty be pronounced to have belonged to Corvinus's collection. The remainder, though of some (although without any external marks of the Corvinian Library) may possibly have been the property of that library prepared expressly and ordered to be Corvinian, and may fairly be believed to have come from the hand of Bonfinius. Of the sixteen, all but one are MSS. on vellum, and richly illustrated. One MS., fears the same date as the Corvinian MSS., and contains the Epistles of Phalaris, in Greek. The other MSS. are one contains mythical historic—and all are of the highest interest. It is quite impossible, copies of them and other similar works made at that period by the scholars whom Corvinus drew to his court, to overestimate their extraordinarily critical value, and may possibly deserve for critical purposes a minute examination. Among the non-Corvinian codices there are a few which appear to be, at least in part, unpublished, especially some ancient Scholiasts of Aristotle, but in default of the opportunity here of referring to any considerable library it is impossible to speak with certainty. One work of more modern interest is certainly unpublished, and will form a most welcome supplement of the series of Byzantine writers, being an account by an eyewitness of the events of the reign of Mahomed the Great, of the capture of Constantinople, and, in a word, of all the exciting scenes of the last seventeen years of that long and eventful history. The MS. is a beautiful one. Dr. Dethier kindly permitted me to look through his transcript of it. The language is singularly pure, and correct for the time, and the narrative accurate with current details."

LAW AND ORDER IN IRELAND.

MORE than once an Irish member in the House of Commons has indignantly demanded to know why the great national institution of volunteers is not extended to Ireland. The reply, though suggestive rather than direct, was well understood, and it implied that the arming of the Irish population, or even such part of it as might be expected to be enrolled in the ranks of volunteers, was a step which no responsible Government could entertain. Recent occurrences have proved that there is a just basis for this policy. In Great Britain no class of the community is excluded from serving as a volunteer, and every man so serving is intrusted with the custody of his rifle, if he chooses to keep it; and therefore in every district there may be, and probably is, a large body of more or less trained men with excellent firearms in their possession. Imagine Belfast to have been such a district for the last ten days. There would have been no need to resort to the limited supply of the gunmakers' shops, which has been the resource of the rioters, and the result would have been in proportion to the ready means of mischief in every man's hand. If the question is again asked why there are no volunteers in Ireland, the answer will be prompt, that, owing to religious and political hatred, and in the face of a large force of most efficient constabulary and of regular troops, an Irish city has been given up for days together to bloodshed and plunder, although its inhabitants did not possess what, for this purpose, may be called the negative advantages of the organisation and weapons, which are the necessary accessories of a volunteer system. Happily for the rest of the United Kingdom, the elements necessary to produce such a contest as has been going on in Belfast do not exist in any town out of Ireland.

It is only those who know the state of religious hatred in the north to whom this state of things can be intelligible; and it is only Irishmen themselves who thoroughly comprehend the feeling which exists in that part of the country. In all other parts of Ireland antagonism between the two sects is now a question of degree; in many parts it has taken much the same tone as that which characterises religious differences in England—that is, it does not rise to such a height of personal enmity and social separation as has been evidenced by the riots in Belfast. But what may be designated the physical results of these riots is nothing compared to the moral effect which will be produced in the district. They will be the occasion of widening still further the breach which divides the Protestants from the Roman Catholics of Ulster. Such an active revival of religious animosity is deeply to be deplored. All sections of political economists in Ireland are now agreed that the only hope of real progress in that country lies in the cessation of those hatreds which have especially flourished in the north—the chosen seat of the Orange faction. In that locality there is still a certain power and a great deal of will to assert the principle of Protestant ascendancy; and, by consequence, there, ever and anon, the Roman Catholics are prone to avail themselves of any opportunity to vindicate their independence and to claim equality. In vain, it appears, does the tide of civilisation roll on in that garden of Ireland; it is powerless to sweep away that sectarian disunion the influence of which seems to be so potent in eliciting the worse qualities of the Irish character. When this feeling culminates in personal collision, the only resource is in the strong hand of power to put down disturbances which cannot be composed by any other means, and this leads naturally to the consideration of the means which were adopted to re-establish law and order in Belfast in a conjuncture so perilous as that to which we are referring.

On the face of the affair, the local authorities appear to have been amply provided with means for putting down the disturbances, even in the beginning. The constabulary was numerous and (in its particular way) well appointed, and troops were brought into the town with sufficient promptitude; but there was palpably prevalent amongst the magistracy timidity, apathy, or even something worse, and they acted neither with tact nor energy. The Roman Catholics of the place go so far as to assert that the authorities were at one with the Protestant mob, and that they took no measures adequate to the quelling of a quarrel in which the latter were likely to obtain a supremacy. However this may be, it is certain that the strategy, so to speak, which was adopted was faulty in principle and failed in its details, and there was a weak and paltering method of dealing with such violence which has often ere now been tried and always egregiously failed. As it seems to us, however, the main element of failure is to be traced to the organisation of the police. The Irish constabulary are said to be the finest set of men that ever were brought together in one body; but they are, in fact, soldiers in everything but name; they are dressed in a uniform distinctly military, and they are armed with rifles and bayonets, while their training is that of the manual and platoon. In short, the Irish constabulary wants that element of the civilian in his composition which is considered to the police-man proper—that is, a man in a certain sense unarmed, who represents the law and trusts to a moral influence, supported only in extreme cases by the truncheon. Such a functionary rushes resolutely into a riot, carries a ringleader, and, if opposed, can knock down his opponent and secure him for his prisoner, thus producing an effect which is remarkably potent on a crowd. The Irish constabulary, encumbered with their weapons and accoutrements, can only make mock charges with the bayonet or else pour a fusillade into a dense mass of persons, causing indiscriminate slaughter—loss enough in the first instance, as regular troops are compelled to do in what ought to be, and generally is, the very last resort. It is no violent hypothesis to assume that, if the Division of the Metropolitan Police had been in existence at the time of the Belfast riots on the first day of their outbreak, that city would not have been practically in the hands of a mob for such a length of time.

No doubt there are details applicable to the suppression of disaffection and tumult, which may be thought to be of minor consideration, and which may be easily arranged. It is possible that a reorganisation of the police and the substitution of imperial stipendiary magistrates for local municipal authorities in Belfast may henceforth be effectual for putting a stop to riots and faction fights in such a time as may be deemed reasonable in Ireland. But the greater difficulty remains as yet unsolved by statesmen and political economists; and that is, the inducement of Roman Catholic and Protestant to dwell together in social peace and harmony. Despite of some recent improvements and many fervent hopes to the contrary, it seems as though all the more one of this state of things in Ireland is postponed until the millennium.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The King Consort of Spain was licensed in Paris last week. On Thursday his Majesty left Paris for Spain. The Spanish Embassy, attended by all who chose to present their respects, left Compiègne on Thursday morning, in accordance, as well as the general Diplomatic Body, with the exception of the Italian Legation, in the honour of the King who was a guest of the Emperor at a dinner given in his honour in the Tuileries, at which the Corps Diplomatique were present; and the same night he attended a special performance given by command at the Grand Opera, from which the public were excluded. On Friday there was a review in the Champ de Mars in his honour, which was itself illustrative next week. Seventy thousand troops of all arms were on the ground, 10,000 of them cavalry, and 120 guns. A steady rainfall damped the popular enthusiasm of the occasion, but did not affect the spirits of the shewers, enjoyed the affair amazingly, and cheered every thing and everybody—from the King Consort to the Zouave, the King of Spain to the smallest drummer-boy—with characteristic vivacity. As the evening was a gala-night at St. Cloud.

A grand fête was given on Saturday at Versailles, in honour of the King. The entertainment was divided into two parts, and lasted from five in the evening till past midnight. The principal interest in the first part was concentrated in the superb fountains in the park, which were seen to much advantage. The Emperor and Empress, with their Royal guest, arrived at half-past five from Trianon, riding in an open carriage, and followed by a numerous cavalcade. After visiting the various fountains and jets, in their Majesties terminated the fête by making a tour of the Neptune basin. The numerous spectators were so great that the horses could scarcely advance, and everywhere their Majesties were received with the most enthusiastic cheers. They returned to the palace at six o'clock, when a ballet and a comedy called "Psyche," by Corneille and Molière, were performed. The King of Spain conducted the Empress, and by the side of the Emperor walked his son, prince Imperial. At dusk as the Imperial and Royal visitors opposed the orchestra played the Royal Spanish March, and the illuminations commenced. Their Majesties retired at eleven. Then commenced the night fête, which consisted of the illumination of the fountains and jets, and of the gardens themselves. Thousands of globe-shaped and cross-ordered lamps were suspended on the trees and spread a most brilliant light, whilst from the sculptured vases bright flames arose, the electric light. There was also a splendid display of fireworks, which, with Bengal lights, rendered the whole of the large palace as clear to the eye as at daylight. The top of the building was illuminated Emperor and the Prince Imperial appeared on the balcony, and were saluted most cordially. The whole of the Court occupied the windows the gardens and witnessed the conclusion of the fête with admiration amongst the visitors, to whom the Emperor had kindly thrown open the reserved gardens. A supper was served at midnight in the Mirror Gallery, and afterwards the Emperor again appeared on the balcony of the palace, and was received with hearty cheers. Speeches made on Tuesday by two of the French Ministers, M. Rouher and M. A banquet took place at St. Etienne on Wednesday evening in consequence of the assembly of the Council-General for the Department de la Loire. The Duke de Persigny, who presided, proposed the health of Napoleon III., "the founder of liberty in France." The Duke's speech was a complete review of the theory of the Imperial Constitution. He showed the form of liberty to vary with every free people. "The present physiognomy of liberty, properly so called," said M. de Persigny, "may be recognised by the striking signs of the solidity and duration of the Governments which it founds, and then demonstrated that, for the purposes of great things." M. de Persigny are not adapted for France; "it not being possible," he continued, "for authority and liberty to exercise in the hands of one class, as in England. Instead of subordinating the one to the other, as was natural under them independent, and this is the fundamental principle of our institutions. The speaker therefore declared that the liberty of the press may be beneficial, it is necessary, in a country new to the exercise of liberty himself, to independent political generation should arise to replace the class enervated by speculation.

The King of Prussia has been a guest of the Emperor of Austria. Their interview have taken place between Herr von Bismark and Count Rechberg, and no doubt will have reference to the claims of the newly-acquired Danish duchies, the topics of conversation. Indeed, the rest of the news or less inspired journals of Paris declares that the understanding regarding the territories conquered from Denmark will not extend beyond Schleswig-Holstein without territorial, political, and military compensation; and that the Austrian Government no longer disapproves of Prussian policy.

At the election of a State Councillor at Geneva, on Sunday, M. James Fazy, the leader of the Radical party, was returned by a large majority in favour of his Conservative opponent, M. Chenevière.

There were serious riots at Geneva on Monday. They are stated to have arisen from the election committee having annulled the election of M. Chenevière. On this becoming known, the Conservatives surrounded the building in which the sittings of the Council were held. The inhabitants of the Faubourg St. Gervais erected themselves and constructed a barricade, and a conflict ensued, in which four persons were killed and many wounded. Hood maintained his lines, and was thought to be receiving reinforcements to interfere with Sherman's communications. It was reported that large bodies of Confederates had taken up a position at Jonesboro.

Letters from General Sherman's army state that the battle on the 20th ult. previously mentioned, was brought on by an attempt by General Hood to outflank General Sherman's right, extending his right. The contest was most severe, and for a time the Federals were driven back, but eventually the Federals repulsed their assailants.

The report of the capture by the Confederates of General Stoneman and a portion of his command is fully confirmed.

The accounts of General Sherman's operations at Mobile were received from despatches sent by the Confederate authorities to Richmond. The American correspondent of the Army and Navy Gazette gives the following account of the seacoast defences of Mobile:—

The entrance to the bay is between Mobile Point and the eastern point of Dauphin Island, the distance between them being about three miles and three quarters. The interior of the bay has deep shoal three miles and which can cross the bay, which has about 11 ft. upon it at low water. A short opposite the mouth of Dog River, eleven miles south of the city of Mobile, prevents vessels drawing more than 9 ft. going further up the bay. A short distance above the mouth of Dog River, and on the bar bearing the same name, obstructions have been placed, and in some places old vessels have been sunk, blocking up the channel, leaving only a narrow passage through them so that their own vessels can pass through. Lines of entrenchments have been thrown up, encircling the city from near Dog River on the Alabama river, and to the bay from twelve large independent and complete works command the approaches and the approach to the city. On at Garrow's Bend is a first-class battery, commanding the river generally, and the main channel; this commands a portion of the railroad. At Three-Mile Creek, guarding the approach to Spanish Fort, is a field-work of a six-gun battery. Fort Huger, between the Alabama river and city of Mobile, is a strong work, mounting 32 guns and 8 mortars. Fort Powell, on the entrance of the bay, is a strong work, mounting 12 guns and 2 mortars. Fort Gaines, on Dauphin Island, is a strong work, mounting 32 guns and 2 mortars. Fort Morgan, on Mobile Point

AMERICA.

NEW YORK, Aug. 12, Evening.

Official Confederate despatches from Mobile, dated the 8th inst., state :—It is painfully humiliating to announce the shameful surrender of Fort Gaines by Colonel Anderson. Colonel Anderson communicated with the enemy by a flag of truce without the consent of General Page, who inquired, by signal, what the firing meant, but received no answer. General Page telegraphed "hold your fort," and immediately visited Fort Gaines, when he found that Colonel Anderson was on board the Federal fleet, arranging a capitulation. The General left orders for Colonel Anderson, on returning, not to surrender the forts, and relieved him of his command. Fort Morgan signalled the surrendering, but received no answer except the hoisting of the Federal flag over the ramparts of Fort Gaines. THE LATE

MR. FREDERICK ROBSON,

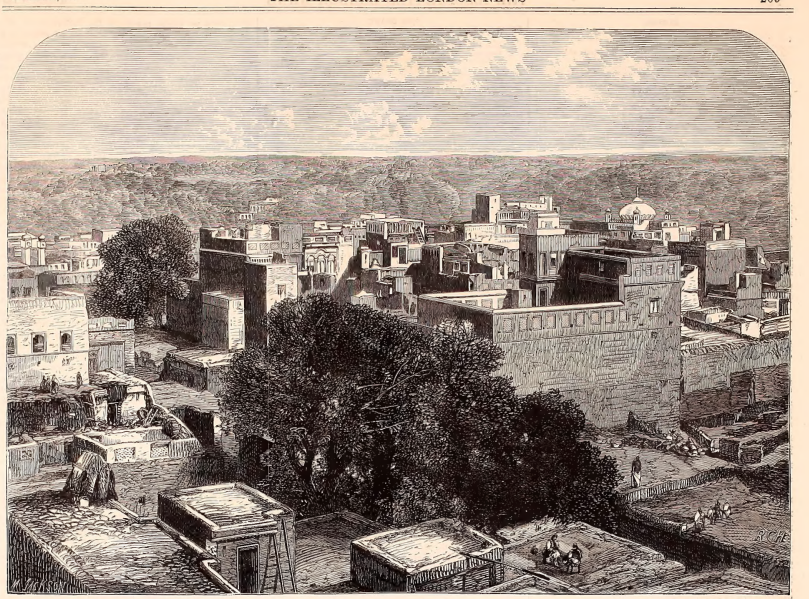
OF THE OLYMPIC THEATRE.

A PORTRAIT of Mr. Robson, whose death, at the age of forty-three, we mentioned last week, is here engraved. He was, beyond question, a man of genius. His acting was unique, and belonged to no school, though he is said when yet a child to have imitated most forcibly the mannerisms of Edmund Kean. He became a strolling player, and passed from one small country town to another till he got an engagement at the Grecian Saloon. There he remained five years, delighting a cockney audience, amidst the fumes of brandy and tobacco, with some of those farcical characters, such as the "Wandering Minstrel," and "Boots at the Swan," with which visitors to the Olympic have since been amused. He was then for three years with Mr. Henry Webb, lessee of the Queen's Theatre at Dublin. In 1853 Mr. Robson came back to London, having been engaged by Mr. Farren at the Olympic. He appeared at Easter of that year in the farce of "Catching an Heiress." He made very little impression in this part, but his time arrived a few weeks later, when the late Mr. Francis Talfourd's burlesque of "Macbeth" was produced. In this Mr. Robson played the chief character, and produced an immense effect. In less than three months after he renewed his triumph by playing Shylock in another burlesque by the same author; and this, with Jem Baggs, in the "Wandering Minstrel," established him as a great and original English actor. When Mr. Farren gave up the theatre, and it was taken by Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Wigan, Mr. Robson was retained as its most valuable attraction. His first essay in the serious part of Fouché's secretary in "Plot and Passion" was another great success; and this was followed by the "Yellow Dwarf," a burlesque by Mr. Planché, in which Mr. Robson made a most unearthly figure. His capacities for domestic drama were shown in the part of Daddy Hardacre, and in such plays as "The Porter's Knot," "The Lighthouse," or "The Red Vial." It was still, however, by his burlesque performances, especially those of Massaniello and Medea, that he commanded the greatest share of public admiration. After the retirement of Mr. Wigan he became manager of the Olympic conjointly with Mr. Emden; nor has he ever been a regular actor at any other theatre since his first appearance there in 1853.

Our Engraving is from a photograph by Mr. Herbert Watkins, of 215, Regent-street.

THE LATE FREDERICK ROBSON, OF THE OLYMPIC THEATRE.

TUNIS WATER-CARRIERS.



THE group represented in our Engraving under this title is from a sketch by an artist who recently visited Tunis and thence went overland to Egypt. In Tunis water-carriers are an indispensable part of the community, as there are no underground mains and pipes for the distribution of that necessary liquid; while the heat of the climate and the Mohammedan customs of ablution make the personal consumption of large supplies of water even more important than it is in our northern climate. The water is carried in earthern jars of a peculiar shape, and a bunch of palm-leaves is placed in the mouth of each vessel to protect it from impurities and to keep the water cool.

VIEWS OF GUZERAT, IN THE PUNJAUB.

WE have been favoured by Captain Edward Paske, of the Bengal Staff Corps, and Deputy Commissioner of the District of Guzerat, with a series of ten photographs, taken by Messrs. Fricke and Jung at his request, which represent some of the most interesting objects and scenes in that province of our Indian empire. Three of them are engraved on the next page. It may be well, before noticing the particular subjects of these Illustrations, to give a brief account of the place. This district of Guzerat, in the Punjaub, lies between the rivers Chenab and Jhelum, and forms a compact block of the upper portion of the tract of country termed the "Chaj Doab." It is from forty-eight to seventy-two miles in length and from twenty-four to thirty-seven miles in breath; and its area is 1880 square miles. The population of the district, according to the Census of 1854, numbers 500,167 souls, being 265·2 per square mile. The land revenue of the district amounts to 521,317 rupees per annum. Guzerat is bounded towards the north by the Cashmere range of mountains, on two sides by the Chenab and Jhelum rivers, and on the fourth side by the district of Shahpore. The Grand Trunk Road from Lahore to Peshawur passes through Guzerat for a distance of thirty-seven miles, from the right bank of the Chenab opposite Wuzeerabad, to the left bank of the Jhelum river, opposite the station of that name.

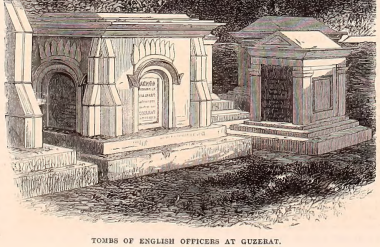
The cultivated area of Guzerat comprises about 593,934 acres. Its chief agricultural products are wheat, barley, rapeseed, linseed, and tobacco in the spring crop; and buckwheat, rice, millet, oil seed, sugar-cane, and cotton in the autumn and harvest. The soil of the district is in many places admirably suited for the cultivation of flax and cotton; and the two rivers which flow on each side of the district afford great facilities for the transportation of agricultural and other products to the seaboard. Among the principal manufactures of the district may be mentioned the shawl and other woollen manufactures, conducted by the numerous "Cashmeres" located in Guzerat, and the "kofi gari," or inlaid iron or gold work produced by skilled artisans in the town of Guzerat. Of trade, exports prevail largely over imports. All kinds of agricultural produce are exported largely, also wool and country clothe. The imports, which are comparatively trifling, comprise chiefly spices, iron, and other metals. In this district, where the grazing lands are very extensive, and the pasturage good, cattle of all kinds are largely bred. The brood mares of the district are considered very fine, and there is a considerable demand for Guzerat horned cattle.

Our first Engraving gives a view of the town of Guzerat. It shows some of the largest houses in the most populous part of the town, and also the dome of a fine mosque. Guzerat is situated on the Grand Trunk Road, about six miles from the Chenab, and contains upwards of 20,000 inhabitants.



The Guzerat district is distinguished as being the battle-field of British conquest in the Punjaub. Here took place the engagement at Sadoolapore, in December, 1848, followed by the sanguinary battle of Chillianwallah, and ending with the fight at Guzerat, where the Sikhs lost the kingdom they had won and consolidated eighty-five years before. We may give next week a view of the stone obelisk erected on the battle-field of Chillianwallah to the memory of those who fell in the fight. In the mean time, our second Illustration represents the tombs of some of the officers and men who fell in the battle at Guzerat. These graves are all inclosed by a substantial masonry wall, and are kept in good preservation.

Our third Illustration shows the English church in the civil station of Guzerat. In 1860, Sir Robert Montgomery, K.C.B., the present Lieutenant Governor of the Punjaub, brought to the notice of the supreme Government the question of accommodation for Protestant worship in the Punjaub provinces, and, feeling a very deep interest in the work, obtained sanction for the construction of churches at all stations where no such accommodation had been provided. Thus, through Sir R. Montgomery's exertions, no less than fifteen small churches were constructed at civil stations in the Punjaub during 1861. The Guzerat Church is one of the number, and was built by Captain E. H. Paske, Deputy Commissioner of the district, on plans furnished by Government.

SCENES IN JAPAN.

WE have engraved, on page 212, two sketches by our Artist in Japan. He writes from Yokohama, under date of June 14, as follows:—"Her Majesty's ship Conqueror has arrived, and the 500 marines were disembarked on Tuesday, the 7th of June. They marched up to the bluff, shown in my sketch, and there pitched their tents. They are a splendid body of men, and created much sensation here. The 20th Regiment is expected soon."

The other Illustration represents a couple of blind musicians performing for the amusement of a gentleman, who listens with evident pleasure to their soothing strains. Blindness is a frequent misfortune among the Japanese; and an institution called the Feki-Sado, a sort of guild of blind men, has been formed to enable them to procure employment and livelihood. The original founder of this guild was a famous general of the Feki party, in the old civil wars between the Feki and the Gendzi. This hero, by name Kakekiko, is represented in a Japanese dramatic poem as having been made prisoner by his rival Joritimo, who treated him so generously that Kakekiko, on being released, voluntarily plucked out both his eyes to prevent his ever being called upon to fight with Joritimo again. The blind warrior, according to this story, then learnt to play on the Syase, or lute, and so began the society of blind musicians, who form, almost exclusively, the orchestras of the public theatres, and find occupation at festivals, weddings, and other ceremonial or convivial assemblies.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS,

LONDON · SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1864.

THIS part of the year tests the resources of the journalist with extreme severity. Given, general peace and prosperity, the silence of political chieftains, the absence of remarkable crimes or casualties, and fair average weather, and the public writer is in the condition the view of which was said to excite pleasure in the gods—that of "a good man struggling with difficulties." He has not even an opportunity of getting up a battle with his professional contemporaries; for, by common consent, a sort of lazy armistice is tacitly established when Parliament rises, and it is seldom broken before the end of the autumn. The dulness of the papers at this time is the subject of the universal and ungrateful complaint of readers.

Perhaps there has not often been a more stagnant week than that which is now about elapsed. What incident of the last six days would the public endure much discussion? Lord Palmerston has visited his constituents at Tiverton, and has made a couple of pleasant speeches—one short, the other longer—and has preached on the text that we are all very happy and comfortable, and ought to rest and be thankful. Well, there is not much room for "improving" that subject. Lord Palmerston is about eighty years of age, and one could dwell through a few paragraphs in complimentary congratulation upon the mental and bodily vigour which enables an aged nobleman to acquit himself with the gaiety of a candidate for public favour. Lord Palmerston took office in 1809, when he became Secretary at War. There is a hint for another form of treatment, and one might advert to the many great things which he has witnessed, including the fall of Napoleon and the restoration of his dynasty, the emancipation of Roman Catholics, the Reform Bill and Act, and the Indian and Crimean Wars. Lastly, Lord Palmerston is the head of a Liberal Government, which promised a new Reform Act; and a third method of dealing with the theme is the pointing out that public opinion has been too strong for the Ministry, and that the Premier is obliged to bow before the torrent. How would be no justification for an attempt to agitate in favour of innovations. But would the public be in the least grateful for any of these three essays, or for all of them; and would not the journal be thrown down with the eternal complaint, "How dull the papers are to-day!"

Of course there are topics; the world goes round (if the Roman Catholic hierarchy will permit us to say so, in deference to the prejudices of the believers in Newton), and people marry, and go to law, and fight, and write foolish letters to newspapers. But of a pressing character there are no such themes he is regarded as prosy; and if he dilates on minor incidents he is derided as twaddling. Shall we state once more that nothing decisive has occurred in the American war, and shall we again deplore the fratricidal contest, and express our sincere wish that good and peaceful arrangements may be arranged? A promising topic for a writer who would be read. Shall we note that the King of Prussia is on a visit to Vienna, and say that, however the Sovereigns who have united in an act of brutal injustice may feast and flatter one another, the blind of justice has recorded their deed, and that Nemesis keeps an account. Suppose it said—what next? Shall we note that the King of Burmah is understood to be making preparations for a war with the English, and has resolved to avenge the disasters of 1825 and 1852. Those are stirring news; but we are not quite sure about it, and Burmah is a long way off, and people would prefer not to attend to the subject until hostilities shall have commenced. Shall we lament that a barbarous Turk is going to sweep away the venerable ruins of Palmyra, and build a modern house with them, and Sir Henry Bulwer does not seem to be inclined to interfere in the interest of poetry and romance. The subject is very interesting to the scholar and the traveller, but does the general public know or care whether Troy was in Europe or Asia? Clearly, there is no foreign topic that will just now lay hold of the world's ear.

Is there anything domestic? The Bishop of Oxford has, in a manner, declared himself upon the great and important question of the inspiration of the Scriptures, and, though he has carefully guarded his qualified language, it is manifest that he is with the new and not the old school of theologians. We might dwell upon this and examine his Lordship's distinctions; but a great number of persons would not read a line on the subject, and a great number more would say that it is a subject which ought not to be treated in a newspaper. We might deny that there is any subject which should not be within the purview of the journalist; but would the argument be acceptable at this period of the year? We trow not. Then we could observe that the Welsh are holding their Eisteddfod at Llandudno, and two courses would be open to us. We could take the Welsh view of the case, and rejoice that efforts were made to preserve an old language which, if no books of much value are written in it, is connected with much interesting fable and romance. Or we might take the English view, and deride the folly of upholding a useless language, without a decent literature; and we might appeal to the declaration of Welsh members of Parliament, that the obstinate adherence to the old tongue is the great hindrance to the civilisation of Wales. Truly, the topic is not exciting. However, we might manage to say something about the intended visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Denmark, and to the intention which certainly existed of letting them be escorted by the Channel Fleet, an intention which has been wisely given up. Did we write wisely? There is certainly a cue for an article. It would have been a splendid sight to see the heir of England and his bride under the care of our sea-captains, and it would have gratified Denmark to behold the mighty force of the nation to whose care she has given the daughter of her King. That is one way of looking at it; but there is another. How ridiculous would it have been for England to bring out her ships when the war had ended, and they could be of no use except to excite the jeers of the Continent, and to wound the feelings of Denmark, by a parade of the power which we might have exerted in her favour but would not. Something might have been made of this, only people are weary of the Danish question.

But, if the gods were pleased to see a poor man in difficulties, it must have been because, in the hour of his extreme need, he would ask help and receive it, if only in the shape of good advice, such as Alcides gave to the carter. A topic has arisen, and it will be welcomed. A Federal force has made capture of a vessel from an English port, and said to be under the English flag. The Georgia has been taken by the Niagara. The former was once a Confederate vessel and wrought wild work with Federal commerce, but she has been sold to an Englishman, and he has had her chartered by the Portuguese, or so it is stated. Had the Niagara a right to seize her? Was her old character done away? Had she become an English ship? Will Earl Russell demand explanations? If she is not given up, shall we go to war with the North, recognise the South, and rush into the struggle to cut off which we have long? The future will decide all these questions; our present duty is to "write and be thankful" for a new topic in this dreary season.

The Preston Guardian states that the Rev. S. J. C. Adamson, late incumbent of Penwortham, has collected the £4000 necessary for erecting four churches, one to be built in each of the following places:—Padiham, Penwortham, Walton-le-Dale, and Preston.

On the 11th inst. the Bishop of Winchester re-consecrated the church of Wootton St. Lawrence, Basingstoke, which has been within the old materials being preserved as much as possible) and a new aisle added.

Maxey Church, Northamptonshire, was reopened for Divine service by the Bishop of Peterborough on Wednesday week, after a restoration by Mr. Cockeon, Vice of Maxey, and family, subscribed upwards of £200 towards the necessary expenses.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has intimated his intention of holding the primary visitation of his diocese according to the following arrangement:—Oct. 11, 12, and 13, at Canterbury; Oct. 14, Dover; Oct. 15, Sandwich; Oct. 17, Sittingbourne; Oct. 18, Maidstone; Oct. 19, Tunbridge; Oct. 20, Sevenoaks.

The annual meeting of the Aberdeen Diocesan Synod took place on the 3rd, when the Bishop presided. There were thirty-seven presbyters in number of souls in connection with the Church in Aberdeen diocese as 8947, and the number of communicants, 2661. The Synod will next meet on September, 1865.

The Episcopal church a new church was consecrated in the large parish of Chesham, in the archdeaconry of Buckingham, by the Bishop of Oxford. The new church, called St. Mary's, Chesham, is situated in a populous suburb of the town called Waterside, and is designed as a chapel-of-ease to the mother church.

On Sunday morning the Archbishop of Canterbury held confirmations in the chapel of Maidstone prison. After the usual morning service at the chapel, which was performed by the Rev. Mr. Hall, he delivered a plain, affectionate charge, addressed chiefly to those about to be confirmed, and to the rest of the prisoners generally. The ceremony of confirmation was then gone through. After a short interval his Grace proceeded to the women's chapel, where the same ceremony was performed. The Archbishop also he delivered a touching address.

The Rev. Dr. Hook, Vicar of Leeds, acting for the Bishop of London, has recently concluded a series of confirmations in the Bloomish provinces. His Lordship has visited the principal towns of the parish, and in each of them, and in each of them a considerable number of young persons were confirmed. At Pendleton, the last of the Bishop's tour terminated, the service was conducted with marked solemnity. Previous to the confirmation, choral service was sung by an efficient choir. The church was crowded in every part by persons from his parishioners, in saving the essay of Christianity, near Liverpool.

SCENES IN JAPAN, BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.

MARINES, FROM H.M.S. CONQUEROR, LANDING AT YOKOHAMA.

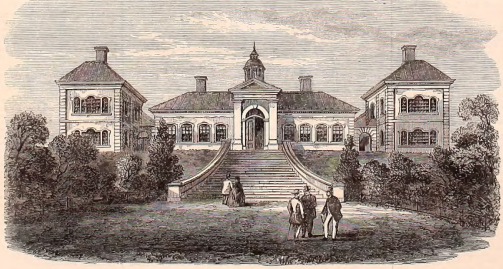
SCENE FROM "ROMEO AND JULIET," BY A. J. WOOLMER, FROM THE EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS.



"SCENE FROM 'ROMEO AND JULIET.'"

THE scene from Shakspeare's play represented in the picture by Mr. Woolmer, engraved above, occurs in the first act, at the close of the masquerade entertainment given by old Capulet. To this "old accustomed feast" Romeo and Benvolio went, though uninvited (they being representatives of the family of Montagu, which was at such deadly feud with that of Capulet), accompanied by the lively Mercutio, the friend of Romeo, and some other maskers. At this same feast Romeo sees Juliet for the first time, and, instantly forgetting his hopeless fancy for the chaste Rosaline, conceives for the new beauty that passion which ends so tragically for both. Juliet, as the reader is well aware, is equally smitten; and as the guests are leaving she learns from her nurse that Romeo (who had been discovered by the fiery Tybalt during the masquerade) is the only son of the great enemy of her house. This is the moment chosen by the painter. Juliet, at the entrance of her father's house, is watching the guests depart; Romeo, lingering behind the rest, raises his domino to signal a parting adieu.

It is not, however, the dramatic interest of the situation which the artist appears to have sought directly to render in the expression of the faces, or even the gestures of the figures. He seems to have aimed rather at conveying the sentiment of the scene suggested by the poet through its outward aspects; and this he has done by representing more especially such effects incidental to the time and place as might be evoked by fancy when quickened by sympathy with the emotions of the principal actors. We do not say positively this was the painter's distinct intention in this illustration of Shakspeare; it was, perhaps, simply the course unconsciously adopted. Mr. Woolmer's taste in art has always inclined to the externally elegant and the arbitrarily ornamental, and he has allowed himself almost unexampled license in the arrangement of colour and in disregard of the requirements of direct imitation. His pictures of fair women at the toilet and similar subjects are unique in three respects, and these peculiarities give to all his paintings a striking individuality. Yet it is impossible to say his pictures do not evince a fine artistic instinct; and often, when the painter comes closer to nature (as he has notably done of late) his works seem to approach near to something really great. We have, however, never seen anything by this artist uniting so many of his characteristics so happily and appropriately as the example engraved. Throughout the whole picture there is a mysterious, palpitating indefiniteness and a subtle phantasmal play of colour which—though we should feel and have felt bound to consider them misplaced in some of Mr. Woolmer's pictures of daylight realities—is certainly most singularly felicitous in this Italian garden-terrace scene, where the silvery haze of a warm midsummer night creeps upon air redolent with the breath of flowers, but hushed, as it were, to all save the gentle cadences of the serenade or the whisper of love; where the rays of the festal-lights from within the door of old Capulet's palazzo or villa and the waning echoes of departing merriment seem only to make the impending silence audible, the darkness visible where the eye can dwell on nothing palpable nor prosaic, but is led from the lambent glow which plays about Juliet and her companion to the dim distance where reality trembles on the confines of fancy—just as we follow that sweep of lamps among the cypresses from the shimmer of the foremost to the farthest and faintest twinkle—those "earth-treading stars" which old Capulet promised "should make dark heaven light." Here we can—while admiring the painter's peculiar magic in this part of his representation, and without losing the sense of keeping and sentiment of poetic repose which prevails throughout—follow the vague chequered track of the quiet, cold-green moonbeams as they steal dreamily over the coloured marbles of the inlaid and tesselated steps from the terrace-walk. Lastly—we might have said "firstly," for all this is but the painter's symphony, or his Lieder ohne Worte—here is to be found all that (without grappling with the enormous difficulty of realising the characters of the poet and the dramatic intensity of their expressions) is most fitting as an accompaniment to the scene, best harmonising with the circumstances of the bitter-sweet commencement of that most passionate and pitiful of all love-stories—the story of Romeo and Juliet.

THE GREY HOSPITAL, KING WILLIAM'S TOWN BRITISH KAFFRARIA.

We present a View of the building which has been erected after the designs of Mr. W. Pilkington, the architect, for this useful institution, which was founded some years ago by Sir George Grey, the present Governor of New Zealand, who at that time was Governor of the Cape. Until 1856 the province of British Kaffraria was entirely destitute of hospital accommodation for either civilians or natives, and there was no medical practitioner within eighty miles of King William's Town. There was a large native population, amongst whom a class of native doctors were practising, who exercised a very pernicious moral influence; for they taught the people that sickness was the result of witchcraft, and that they alone were able to cure the sick. The people implicitly believed in their power, and whenever any person was afflicted by sickness the witch-doctor was sent for to smell out the individual who had bewitched the patient. This procedure generally ended in the torture and death, by fire or by stinging ants, of the person suspected, who in any case was stripped of all his cattle and property. The sick, whether suffering from fevers, or dysentery, or inflammation of the lungs, were generally covered over with cowdung; while the doctor professed, by virtue of his supernatural authority, combined with suction, to extract the poisoned matter from the interior of the body. Sometimes the doctor would exultingly display a lizard, a piece of stick, or a stone, as the successful result of this operation. There were, however, a few of these Kaffir doctors who treated disease by the administration of such medicinal herbs as experience had pointed out to be good; but these few were generally discredited and ill-treated they were in ignorance. From amongst these false doctors false prophets frequently arose, disturbing the peace of the country and inciting the people to war. Every Kaffir war had its witch doctor, who professed to be able to terrify the enemy, and to impart to the Kaffirs strength enough to drive the Europeans out of their land. As a measure of policy, no less than that of love of humanity, it was highly necessary for the Governor to establish a system of medical relief which should compete with the witch doctor's influence. He also adopted the first to create one central hospital, in which native surgeons might be educated, and then to employ them as district medical officers, in small hospitals or dispensaries to be formed in various localities, giving them permission at the same time to earn money by private practice among their own people. We are informed by Dr. D. Mundy, a gentleman lately returned from South Africa, who has obliged us with this communication, that the hospital at King William's Town, the building shown in our Illustration, is now attended by more than thirty thousand patients. There are two native students in the hospital at present, who were educated at Lovedale Seminary under the Rev. Mr. Govan. They have passed the preliminary examination in general knowledge required by the College of Surgeons, and have made considerable progress in their medical studies. It is proposed to send them to London to complete their medical education. One is a Kaffir, the other a Fingo. The medical officers at present connected with the institution are Dr. Fitzgerald, the Superintendent of Native Hospitals; Dr. Ryan, M.D. Trinity College; and Mr. Daines, Member of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain. The building shown in our Illustration is so planned as to allow each patient 1000 cubic feet of air, as recommended by the Royal College of Surgeons; the wards being 22 ft. square, with domed or pitched ceilings 15 ft. high. Besides a fireplace and a window in each ward, there is an opening 4 ft. square at the top of the ceiling, surmounted by a ventilating cowl, through which fresh air is admitted through tubes from without, terminating in zinc boxes with perforated plates over them, in the centre of the floor.

THE THEATRES.

We are now on the verge of changes in regard to theatrical matters; but, as in fact, very few changes are ever made with respect to them or the semi-dramatic entertainments which many persons accept as desirable substitutes for more representations, it is perceived that the present is the last week of Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's contribution to the Shakespeare demonstration, and that the celebration of "The Bard and his Birthday," with the visions of Puck, Ariel, Touchstone, the Weird Sister, and Ariel, will, after this week, "like the substantial pageant faded," leave not a rack behind. On Thursday evening they announce a second season of their Open di Camera entertainment, which will commence with an entirely new and original work, entitled "The Haunted Hotel," supported by Mr. W. Bale, Esq. The libretto is from the pen of Henry Farnie, Esq. A comic cantata, by Mr. Corney Reed himself, entitled "Some Of Many Cooks," from the music of Mr. Offenbach, and written by M. Furnell, will follow. It is proposed that the system of the Stereoscope of Illustration will continue to prove attractive for a considerable period.

The Lyceum Theatre will not reopen until October, when Mr. Fechter will reappear in a new drama. The Surrey Theatre will open next Saturday under great advantages, the interior having been re-decorated and embellished, fresh seats with hideous backs provided with conveniences, in imitation of Drury Lane and the Haymarket, and with the patronage of the royal household. The Standard Theatre is now in course of re-section, on a much enlarged scale, and, too, the undistributed funds in the hands of the principal points of consideration, and chairs will be provided in the boxes for the audience. The Princess's is likely to keep open for the extended season, "The Queen's Highway of London" having excited general attention. The complete manner in which this piece has been got up on the stage is the true cause of its success; the merit of the acting is also considerable. Mr. Vining's assumption of Badger is a strong and vigorous performance, and that also of Mr. Vollaire, the agency by which the drama is illustrated, to secure its triumph. At the Adelphi, "Masks and Faces" has been revived, and Mrs. Stirling reappeared in Margaret Wolfington. Mr. Webster, of course, performed Triplet. A new play at the Lyceum, entitled "The Lost Inheritance," has considerable merit. Mr. Mead is distinguished in it by some efficient acting in a powerful part. The entrance is entitled Love's Pathway, a mendicant and an idiot. Like Cinon, however, in the presence of Iphigenia, love awakens the lost heart, and so kindles the intellect that he becomes an intellectual and courageous man. The changes of mental development are well indicated by Mr. Mead.

A conspiracy has been discovered in the Southern Tyrol, and been followed by numerous arrests by the Austrians.

On Wednesday the new railway from Eccles, through Tyldesley to Wigan, constructed by the London and North-Western Railway Company, was formally opened.

The four scientific Italians who had been ignominiously imprisoned in the Castle of San Leo by the Papal Government of that region, and released, after many efforts, at the instance of Russia, have been set at liberty and safe on their way to Florence.

Tuesday's Gazette contained a despatch and inclosures from General Grey, the commander of Her Majesty's forces in New Zealand. From these it appears that, after abandoning the intrenchment at Tauranga, where the English troops suffered so severely from sickness, and where a redoubt on the ranges about ten miles off. Further, owing to the advanced season—from the middle of the month of August—it was not considered prudent to follow them. The settlement of Whangarei being reported in danger of imminent transference to the Kaipara district, the Governor of Auckland Warre, with 300 men, was ordered to proceed from New Plymouth to revisit the intended site, and, in the meantime the troops were maintained vigilantly by a body of natives friendly to the English rule, and Whangarei was thus placed in a position of complete safety. Troops were concentrating in Auckland with the view of being dispatched to any point where their services might be required. Since the date of Tauranga there had been no new collision with the troops. That occurred in the neighbourhood of New Plymouth, where the rebels attacked a redoubt, and repulsed with great loss, while there was but one casualty on our side. Until the commencement of September further military operations were not considered practicable on the part of the island.

The department of the Hautes-Pyrénées celebrated last week the inauguration of the statue erected at Tarbes to the memory of Baron Larrey, surgeon of the Imperial Guard, a native of the department. A people was innocence. All the local authorities and the principal inhabitants of the town and department were present at the ceremony. The statue, the cortege which was to conduct the present Baron Larrey, son of the illustrious surgeon, to the statue of Napoleon, which also has been erected by Jules Cloquet, of the Institute, especially deputed by the Academy of Medicine of Paris, Inspector of the Academies, Sedillot and Nélaton, Professor of the Faculty of Sciences at Toulouse; and M. Juverual, member of the Legislative Assembly by the side of the Baron. On arriving at the Cours Napoleon the cortege was received with loud cheers, and Baron Larrey was at once conducted to the estrade of honour, where he took his seat by the side of Mgr. Lonrmeze, the Bishop of the diocese. After the usual formalities, the veil covering the statue was withdrawn. Speeches were then made by M. Garnier, Prefect of the Hautes-Pyrénées; an admirable one by Dr. Jules Cloquet, in the name of the Academy of Medicine; by M. Cazalis, in the name of the medical corps of the army; by M. Juverual, as President of the Academic Society of the Hautes-Pyrénées; and by M. Joly, as representative of the Imperial Academy of Toulouse. All these gentlemen dwelt with much eloquence on the great qualities, genius, patriotism, and national virtues of the great man whose memory they had met to honour, and were most enthusiastically cheered by the multitude.

Major-General Sir Robert Walpole, K.C.B., commanding the forces in Ireland, has issued a general order for the annual inspection of the garrison, last saturday, on Chatham Great Lines, when the troops were present. There was a review of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, the Royal Marines Light Infantry, and three battalions of infantry of the line. The inspection commenced at half-past one o'clock precisely, and about two hours, when they were abruptly put an end to by the rain, and the troops marched off home.

From a return just issued by the Admiralty the public may be able to form some ideas of the cost incurred by the nation in the construction of its iron-clad navy. The first iron-plated vessel built was the converted on Captain Coles' system, naturally attracts attention in the first place. Two other vessels—the Prince Consort and the Ajax—were built on the wooden three-decker to that in which she now is has been £120,714; but the Monarch, Captain Coles's second iron-plated vessel, has not yet been fitted on is not stated. The Achilles has cost £581,025; the Black Prince, built by the same firm, £581,025; the Warrior, £377,391; the Minotaur, £512,971; the Prince Consort, £371,683; and the Royal Oak, £315,584. Mr. Reed's two ships also have cost a large sum—the Bellerophon, £370,000; the Hercules, for £395,079. If the public could be satisfied of the excellence of the plan, as had the Chippewa been built and completed as originally designed in the year ending March 31, 1864, were—on ships and vessels building in the Royal Dockyards, £1,000,000; on ships and vessels building in private yards, £1,000,000; on ships commenced as wooden ships and converted while on the stocks, £1,000,000; on ships converted from wooden ships and completed afloat, the first as a wooden ship converted into an iron-cased capola-ship; and the second as a wooden screw-frigate converted into an iron-cased ship, £1,000,000. The grand total of the amounts expended, therefore, during the year ending March 31, 1864, is £6,000,000.

The annual inspection of the corps comprising the 3rd Administrative Battalion of Kent Volunteers took place at Chatham, on Thursday week, by Lieutenant-Colonel R. G. A. Lloyd. The companies present consisted of the 18th and 45th (Olive of Rochester), 9th (Chatham), 42nd (Sheerness), 39th (West Malling), 29th (Northfleet), and 12th (Dartford). Before the arrival of the inspecting officer several troops of the Provisional grounds in the vicinity of Fort Pitt, when they were put through the exercises and movements of skirmishing, under the command of Captain Dent. Captains Hayward, of the 42nd, and Lieutenant Marsh, of the 18th Kent, exercising the battalion in the movements of the inspection exercises. At the conclusion of the inspection Colonel Lloyd briefly addressed the volunteers, and stated that he was pleased to see the improvement on last year's inspection. Although the movements had not been performed as steadily as they might have been, yet, on the whole, they had performed very creditably. The 1st corps of the Administrative Brigade of Kent Artillery Volunteers, consisting of 300 men, under the command of Captain-Commandant G. E. Shotland, were inspected, on Wednesday week, by Colonel Sir R. Dallas, C.B., commanding the Royal Artillery stationed at the Chatham district. After the inspection of the volunteers on the parade-ground, which was in very perfect satisfactory, both as regards equipment, arms, clothing, and accoutrements, as well as the manner in which the parade manœuvres were effected, the inspecting officer expressed the most satisfactory opinion of their duties by manning the batteries commanding the entrance to Chatham Harbour. They did so by exercising with the 64-pounder and 32-pounder muzzle-loading guns. The projectiles fired on the occasion consisted of 64-pounder and 32-pounder solid shot and common shell, the target being moored to seaward, at a range of about 1800 yards. Notwithstanding a stiff breeze blowing from the south-west in a line of fire, causing the buoys to have a very unsteady motion, the guns were pointed with accuracy, nearly every shot and shell striking within a few feet of the target.

On Thursday week the 2nd Kent Artillery Volunteer Corps held a prize-meeting at Spinkle Park, near the seat of Major Hall, who, prize, subscribed for by the inhabitants of Faversham and its neighbourhood, were competed for. There was a large attendance of spectators, including the Harris and party, and many of the leading families of the district. There were four companies present, the corps also amounting to over 400 at the largest cap value £7 7s. The latter was won by Sergeant Hawkins. The cup becomes the property of any company that can win it three times in succession, the close of the last competition the prize was distributed by Lord Harris.

On Saturday last the 4th Kent Artillery Volunteers, under the command of Captain L. B. Magnus, were inspected by Colonel Boxer, C.B., on the Grand Parade at Sheerness. After being put through the military evolutions, the men were formed into detachments and drilled at the guns, concluding the inspection by firing from the 32-pounder and 68-pounder muzzle-loaders at the target, which was moored about one mile and a half from the shore. After they had made some very good practice thereat, Colonel Boxer addressed them, complimenting them on their able-like appearance on parade and on their general efficiency.

The annual rifle meeting took place last week between the Chipperham and Melksham corps, on the ground of the latter. At 200 yards the Chippenham men beat the Melksham corps by twenty points; while at the next ranges the Melksham made superior scoring, and succeeded in beating the Chippenham men by 7 points. The total score was 1,000 points.

The Shepton Mallet (16th Somerset) have had another friendly contest with the Bath (2nd Somerset) company; and the latter were again defeated. The following are the scores for their competition on Wednesday week. Private John Allen was the winner, and the cup passed to him by Captain Bowles, of the Bath company.

The annual inspection of the 11th and 12th (Truro), the 3rd (Falmouth), and the 21st (Penryn) Duke of Cornwall's Volunteers, numbering upwards of 500 men, took place on Monday week, at Truro. The inspecting officer was Lieutenant-Colonel Hume. After a long drill had been gone through, the inspecting officer made a congratulatory address, in which he was three years since he had seen so large a number of Cornish volunteers together, and he was glad to find the high opinion of them formed then was not cold-iers, and he could believe no greater praise on them than to say that the expectations he then formed had been fully realised.

The Oxfordshire volunteers have just held their annual prize-meeting at the Headington Hill Park Butts (Oxford); forty-seven gentlemen from the several corps competed for the county prizes. The first prize, for the highest score at the three ranges, was won by Private Hedges (Thame); and the fourth to Sergeant Hexee (Henley), Corporal Walker (Thame), and Private Underhill (Oxford). The first prize of £15 and bronze medal of the National Rifle Association, for the highest aggregate score at the three ranges, was won by Sergeant-Instructor Fitch (Oxford); second, by Private Venables (Oxford); third, by Private Page (Banbury); and fourth, by Corporal Smith (Bicester). The silver cup annually offered by Colonel Smith, M.P., was gained by Private Bacon (Oxford); Gulley (Bicester) taking the second, and Gardner (Thame) the third prize. The association prizes were carried off as follows:—First, Sergeant Cuttebrook (Thame); second, Private Hedges (Thame); third, Sergeant Bucknell; and fourth, Private C. Underhill (Oxford). The silver cup given by the officers was won by Private Collins (Oxford); second, Private Hedges (Oxford). The non-commissioned officers' cup was carried off by Private Bacon, who won Colonel Smith's cup; second prize, Private Collins (Oxford). Two prizes offered for second and third class marksmen were gained by Corporal Ward and Private Underhill (Oxford).

In Suffolk, the Lowestoft battery paraded at the drill-shed on Thursday week, when the prizes for great-gun firing were distributed. The first subdivision took the first prize, and Major's prize of £5, for the best shot making the best shots. The volunteers, after the distribution, were entertained by Mrs. Major at the Victoria Hotel, Pett-hill, Oulton.

A party of about thirty of the Lincoln corps proceeded last week to Gainsborough to complete their class-firing at 800 and 900 yards, and every two of them failed to obtain a sufficient number of marks to entitle them to become marksmen. Colour-Sergeant Bourne made the highest score, and has consequently become the holder for the year of the Gainsborough cup; he receives, in addition, a prize of £5 from the funds of the corps. At the conclusion the proceedings the Lords Scrope, the Chairman offered prizes to be shot for by the first, second, and third classes in the first series of the first class of the Lincoln corps. Major Wood, the second class the first prize was won by Captain Robson; and in the second class the first prize was by Sergeant Wright. The total score of 42 by Sergeant Wright, was won by Lance-Corporal Bruty.

A return match between ten members of the Loughborough and ten of the Melton company has just been decided at the Melton range. The former won the series by 1,000 points to 928; Loughborough 100, Melton 92. A match between twenty of the Melton company and twenty of the Ashby-de-la-Zouch company was also decided on Thursday week, at Melton.

Major-General Sir Robert Walpole, K.C.B., commanding the forces in Ireland, has issued a general order for the annual inspection of the garrison, last saturday, on Chatham Great Lines, when the troops were present. There was a review of the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers, the Royal Marines Light Infantry, and three battalions of infantry of the line. The inspection commenced at half-past one o'clock precisely, and about two hours, when they were abruptly put an end to by the rain, and the troops marched off home.

From a return just issued by the Admiralty the public may be able to form some ideas of the cost incurred by the nation in the construction of its iron-clad navy. The first iron-plated vessel built was the converted on Captain Coles' system, naturally attracts attention in the first place. Two other vessels—the Prince Consort and the Ajax—were built on the wooden three-decker to that in which she now is has been £120,714; but the Monarch, Captain Coles's second iron-plated vessel, has not yet been fitted on is not stated. The Achilles has cost £581,025; the Black Prince, built by the same firm, £581,025; the Warrior, £377,391; the Minotaur, £512,971; the Prince Consort, £371,683; and the Royal Oak, £315,584. Mr. Reed's two ships also have cost a large sum—the Bellerophon, £370,000; the Hercules, for £395,079. If the public could be satisfied of the excellence of the plan, as had the Chippewa been built and completed as originally designed in the year ending March 31, 1864, were—on ships and vessels building in the Royal Dockyards, £1,000,000; on ships and vessels building in private yards, £1,000,000; on ships commenced as wooden ships and converted while on the stocks, £1,000,000; on ships converted from wooden ships and completed afloat, the first as a wooden ship converted into an iron-cased capola-ship; and the second as a wooden screw-frigate converted into an iron-cased ship, £1,000,000. The grand total of the amounts expended, therefore, during the year ending March 31, 1864, is £6,000,000.

On the 1st inst. the Duke of Zetland a portion of the 1st Battalion of North Riding Volunteers, comprising the 9th, 5th, and 13th North York corps, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Hutton, assembled on the grounds of Aske Hall for review on Thursday week. The volunteers were joined by the 4th Battalion, which had to receive the first attack, while, in his Lord Lieutenant's uniform, rode past the ranks, musketry inspecting the men. After the inspection the battalion was marched off, and the movements of battalion drill, at the close of which they were marched to the hilltop in front of the mansion, where they opened fire. They were joined by Lord Zetland, Earl and Countess Cathcart, Lord and Lady Teignmouth, Lord and Lady Londesborough, Lord Feversham, and the Hon. R. O. Powlett, Count Cathcart, and others forming Lord Zetland's party, forming the third battalion, and the movements being opened. THE COTTON-MILLS, THE WORKPEOPLE, AND THE RAW MATERIAL.

THE cotton famine may be said to have terminated in August, 1863, yet that every one then fell into work, and the mills were opened, and the relief committees stopped payment, but the stocks of manufactured goods were then exhausted, and demand began again to make itself actively felt. During all last autumn and winter manufacturers could obtain orders for goods, and the cotton supply of this year has quite equalled the anticipations formed of it.

The fact that former stocks were absolutely exhausted implies a state of things not generally credited. To replace this stock in hand, both here and abroad, would require, according to the best authorities, the full-time co-operation of every mill in Lancashire for the next two years. Of late, every dealer in cotton goods has run upon the old stock. These old stocks are larger than may be supposed. No thrifty manufacturer, high or low, is proof against a cotton excess. It's no ill store; sooner or later it will be wanted for under-clothing; may never be so cheap again—such is the argument which recommends the purchase. The retail dealer, be he hawker or shopkeeper, knowing the speculative character of his customers in this respect, covers, on his principle to "go in for a job lot," the wholesale dealer is, of course, under the same influence; and if we suppose (which is not unnatural) that there is a tendency to buy in excess of immediate requirements on the part of customers abroad, it will be easily seen that the stock in hand may be quite as considerable as we suppose it to be.

Abundant proofs are happily no longer wanting of the improved position of the cotton trade. We have always looked hopefully upon this question; and when our leading daily contemporary looked upon the permanent loss of the cotton trade as an event certain to be recorded, we stated that the check would prove but a starting-point for a season of prolonged and unrivalled prosperity.

The total weights of raw cotton taken by Spain 30 this year amounted to 237,260,416 lb., against 239,033,940 lb. in the corresponding six months of 1863, and 185,106,096 lb. in the corresponding six months of 1862. The imports in the first half of this year have more than doubled as compared with the corresponding half of 1862, and as compared with 1863 with 1863, we see an increase this year of no less than 198,276,476 lb. Assuming that this rate of increase continues for the remainder of the year, it would give a total importation of 518,452,952 lb., and in that case—hypothetical of course, but not improbable—the total recognised for 1864 would exceed 1,000,000,000 lb. During the previous ten years no import of cotton exceeds that of 1860—viz., 1,083,585,752 lb., so that we should be getting very near our best times again.

In view of this very encouraging state of things, so great is the increased consumption that the expected fall in prices will not take place. This continuance of high quotations will, however, prove of great advantage, because it will give confidence to the producers all the world over, and, lead, in consequence, to a very great extension of the production, whilst, if a sudden fall took place, the stoppage of many enterprising persons would be paralysed. It cannot be expected, however, that, making allowances for exports of raw cotton and all other contingencies tending to reduce the apparent consumption, the increase in the supply of cotton for home consumption upon the quantity imported in 1863 will be 200,000,000 lb., that figure is not anticipated.

Looked at from another quarter, there is not a little in the present aspect of affairs to cause alarm. In 1860, when the largest quantity of cotton was brought in, the price was 7d. per lb.; and in 1862, 1863, and in 1864, and to 21d. in 1863. The average for the first five months of this year has been 22 3/4d. per lb.; and it is at this rate of average for the first five exceeds the average for the first three months. If we are reading, therefore, the signs of the times, we require no more than three times what it then was, think of the enormous sum being absorbed for its purchase! Judging by the state of the account to May 31, declared by a committee of the Bank of England, we are rolling on to the expenditure of about £80,000,000 this year for raw cotton. Make it another year, and see why the figure should not be sudden. From this frightful elevation we must be let down gently—else there will be bones broken, and necks too. The desire was that this fall in price might be brought about when the stocks were in the hands of the producers, and not here; but now, it seems, we are in for it.

The demand for the manufactured goods has sat in with great animation from the Home Trade, Holland, Belgium, Portugal, India, Egypt, Brazil, China, the Austrian territories, the west coast of Africa, Mexico, Gibraltar, Malta, and Australia; so that, although we hear something of distress in certain towns, we may be assured that the mills will soon absorb all the able-bodied operatives. Considerable delay, may be entertained as to what number there would be sufficient hands to be found to work the old mills, and the new ones which have been built; this labour was expected to be many in number. These new buildings are very numerous; they are raised in proof of the strong faith in the great time coming, and will, with the old mills, which are nearly ready for re-occupation, need to accommodate more hands, demand a greater population than will be now found in the cotton districts. No doubt the cotton manufacture has been much reduced. Yorkshire and other parts of the country have absorbed a large number of those who, being without families, could quit their homes or lodgings with comparative facility, and a considerable number have yielded to the desire to touch a foreign shore. Had our past deportation of the workpeople been greater, it was demanded by persons who suspected the good feeling of the operatives, a heavy loss would have been struck at the profits of the manufacturers may, as Mr. Arnold supposes in his admirable "History of the Cotton Famine," have shown less regard for the man than for his labour, but they were generally too much under easy schemes for emigration on a large scale. The event has shown that they were right. The difficulty is already experienced in getting the workpeople of certain classes. Those workmen who have gone have been of the best class, and it will take time to train others to fill their places. The difficulty expressed may also be traced to a certain amount of demoralisation, which must be confessed. Many who have been idle for two years have grown fond of idleness, and of their own bread.

On the whole, however, nothing can exceed the joy with which the people have welcomed the bales of cotton to their several mills. Scout, Sea Island, and Egyptian, in their staggering progress, on the barrow, through the Lancashire streets, have been received with the most spirited ovations. Prayers, invocations, and hymns of praise have been offered up as loads of the lightly-packed material passed by the way along. Hearty hussas have rent the air, and frantic women have sprung upon the bales, torn them open, filled their aprons in their hands, and rapturously kissed the fluffy liberator. One of many occurrences of this kind is reported from Glossop. Some days ago a mill there was recently reopened. The people proceeded with the lorries to the railway to welcome the first arrival of cotton. The loads were packed—men, women and children—on the waggons and on the bales, bearing banners—the crowd formed a procession—and, as the cotton was being hauled up by the crane, the operatives joined in singing, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow" and "Hard times, come again no more."

Also now for a word respecting the present condition of the workpeople. At the meeting of the Central Relief Committee, held on Monday week, Mr. Mellor reported the balance in hand to be £129,450, small sums still continuing to dribble in to swell the grand total. The applications to local relief committees are rapidly diminishing, and the committees themselves are fast becoming merely facts of a bygone time. The average percentage of pauperism on the population of the twenty-seven unions administered by the Blackburn Board of Guardians in the corresponding week of 1861 it was 27·4; and in the corresponding week of 1863 it was 7·4. The decrease in the relief needed by able-bodied men is very notable, while, as may be supposed, since January the people in full work have increased from 210,739 to 292,448, and these out of work have decreased from 158,653 to 101,568. The average pressure on the rates being now only double that of 1861, which was admitted to be the most prosperous year ever known in Lancashire, it was considered that something should be done to prepare the whole of the cotton districts for the cessation of aid from the Central Committee. That body consequently resolved "that the grants of this committee will in future be confined to the relief of persons not receiving parochial aid in all unions where the pauperism does not exceed five per cent upon the population."

The operation of the Public Works Act—which reflects such credit on Mr. Villiers, who suggested it, and Mr. Rawlinson, C.E., with his Assistant Commissioner, Mr. Arnold, who have advised and superintended the work—has been highly beneficial. To the 5th of July last the total amount of loans ordered is £1,499,883. The instruments advanced to the local authorities in respect of 126 loans amounted £426,059. There are few townships that have not undertaken public works under this Act. The little more than a year have removed many diseased hills and vales, and kept their poor off the rates during the winter. The expenditure hitherto has been £1,000 per week, and the results are found to be most satisfactory. Except in scarce instances, the landowners have proven the land more valuable by widening, &c. The principle of the Act—that the guardians' expenditure in unskilled labour has amounted to 75 per cent of the loans. Mr. Rawlinson, taking a less sanguine view of the speculative character of the lands by the roadsides, is of opinion that it would be advisable to extend the Act and to lend more no yey, but he does not think it necessary to extend the Act to the present state of the cotton trade. As a precautionary measure it would be well to do this, however, as there are many improving projects which were not granted to those corporate bodies who desired them. On the one side no investment could be safer, none of more national importance as effecting the health and character of the population, or of more local value as tending to relieve the reduced body of ratepayers of a crushing weight. It is far from impossible that a fall in the price of cotton may, for a time, check the flight of the shuttle, and throw a considerable number of the mill hands upon the roads; however, we shall then have reason to be thankful that such a provision has been made for a temporary relapse. The actual distress is now pretty much confined to Preston, Burnley, Ashton, and Glossop, and the first will merit a further notice as the winter approaches, minuter particulars respecting the state of the operatives may be left till then.

SCIENTIFIC NEWS.

THE MUSCLES CONNECTED WITH THE HAIR AND FEATHERS have been described by Mr. Wilson Saunders as consisting of bundles of the white fasciculi which have hair varies in proportion with its quantity. The muscular fibres of the hair-muscles are attached to the fibrous tissue of the surface of the dermis, and inserted in the base of the follicles; and there are also transverse fibres between these and the deeper-seated muscles of the skin. These muscles also produce the movements which cause erection of the hair. The muscles of birds have not only the power to move and exercise the same functions with feathers as they do with the hair of mammals. The striated muscular fibres of the Greater and Lesser Sternum are united into large muscular bands, which form a system completely distinct from the ordinary muscles found under the skin.

TERRESTRIAL MAGNETISM AND ELECTRICITY.—Father Secchi, of Rome, has recently communicated to the French Academy of Sciences the results of his observations on the correlation of the displacements of electricity and magnetism. (Comptes Rendus, Vol. 58, No. 26.) He says that during the last two years he has made a series of observations which led him to conclude that the variations of the currents of magnetised bars and of electricity in the earth have not always the same direction and motion, that we should not confound this action with that of the heating of the earth's surface, and that we should study with care the effects of the daily electric flux and reflux, allied to the solar action, the energy of which, in the temperate zone, is equivalent to a current of about 1-100th of a unit. Light. The opinion put forth by M. De la Rive that the diverse variations of the electric and magnetic currents are connected together is of unique great probability.

FOSSIL MUSK (OVIBOS MOSCHATUS).—In the valley of the Ore, near Paris, Dr. Eug. Robert has found a portion of the skull of this animal, which he communicated to the Academy of Sciences, and a notice of the Academy of Sciences in a memoir by M. Lartet. Here is, then, a species which was found in the north of Europe and in the north of Europe. We now know that the reindeer, yet more arctic in its migrations, in the same geological epoch, lived in the south of France, and we may be now precisely of other animals new denizens of extreme northern countries. Will now "the struggle for existence" have ceased? Will the migrations of these animals been effected? Has it been by elective migration from their native lands, or by compulsory migration, or by the total destruction of species, condemned to extinction, as has been the case with the great cave lion, the cave bear, the mammoth, and the rhinoceros of the Somme? These questions remain to be solved, and we are still led to repeat what Stephen Gerard Kemble, the author of "Cosmos," has said, that "Geology in its knowledge is not yet exact."

PRESERVED PROVISIONS—REGULATED SHIPS, &c.—In reference to our notice of M. Becquerel's researches "On the Preservation of Copper and Iron in the Sea" (ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, Vol. 44, p. 164), we have received letters from Mr. Hall, the writer and Mr. Jolmson, of Manchester, calling attention to the fact that the Admiralty, in shipping for the Australian, Portuguese, eighteen, and one hundredth of the chinches of zinc, each weighing 1 lb., measuring 6 inches in length by 1 inch in width of one, two, and three months, that the zinc had exercised a remarkable preservative effect. Mr. Hall, in a letter to the Admiralty, and to Mr. Reed, the shipbuilder, of Newcastle, but his illness prevented the prosecution of the matter. The zinc was supplied by Messrs. Johnson and Matthey, and Messrs. Fisher of iron three inches thick were attacked with great care to pieces of zinc, and the experiment was tried with success. The money in small samples of galvanised iron, similarly attached, were also immersed. By certain calculations, Mr. Hall found and iron pail it galvanised iron, and zinc in sea-water 2·600 and 2·280, while the wood and galvanised iron in distilled water 1·000 and 1·000. The specific gravity of sea-water 1·026. The immersion for a longer period gave corresponding results, proving the great preservative power of zinc, both as regards the iron and copper, and also the injurious action of sea-water. The writer adds that it was ascertained in a most extraordinary manner at the time was not liable to be removed from the blocks of iron by intense friction.

COLOURING MATTER OF EMERALDS.—At a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris was read a letter on this subject from M. Wohler to M. H. Ste.-Claire Deville, of which we give a summary:—Independently of the colouring matter of the beryl, which is generally attributed to it the green colour. In 1858 M. Lewy published his interesting researches on the chemical composition of emeralds, and concluded that they are rich in Mrom, in New Granada, in which he considered that the colour was due to the presence of chromium, the effect of which is to produce green colours. Having procured some of the green colour disappeared after the emeralds had been gone but 15 minutes, and by a prolonged heat they assumed a transparent homogeneous glass, presenting a green colour. He found that 12 parts of oxide of chrome were sufficient to produce a very deep green colour, and that the emerald is due to the oxide of chrome without requiring the presence of any other colouring matter in the natural.

MICROSCOPICAL STRUCTURE OF METEORITES.—Mr. H. C. Sorby, reading before the Royal Society an elaborate essay in explaining geological phenomena, and his study of the microscopical structure of crystals, has turned his attention to that of meteorites. In his paper to the Proceedings of the Royal Society he says that, in the first place, it is impossible to study the structure of these bodies without the aid of polarised "glass cavities," similar to those in the olivine of lavas, they proving that they consolidated from a state of fusion. Moreover, the fact that they contains "gas cavities," like those so common in volcanic minerals, this indication is further confirmed, and it is evident that they have cooled sufficiently, a carefully-prepared thin section and a magnifying power of 200 diameters will be sufficient to show the microscopic characters of any one of them. It is to be met with crystals not amongst the crystals in the mass of the meteorite, but also in the form of the material in which they were imbedded. The chief or ordinary crystals have the most remarkable characteristic structure and optical properties of artificial glasses. Some of these have a structure exactly resembling a stream-like structure, and to that of stony lavas, where the shape and mutual relations of the crystals is one rather of accident than of any regular order or definite form. A structure is also found so remarkably like that of consolidated volcanic ashes as to be scarcely known for it. It would appear that the meteorites or meteorites were melted a considerable portion was broken up into small fragments, and subsequently cemented together by the same material. Mechanical and chemical means, amongst which must be classed a segregation of the particles of the same kind, have produced a structure exactly resembling "fluxion structure." "There are," says Mr. Sorby, "certain peculiarities in physical structure which connect meteorites with volcanic rocks, and, at the same time, others in which they differ most characteristically—facts which, I think, must be borne in mind not only in forming a conclusion as to the origin of meteorites but also in attempting to explain volcanic action in general."

INTOXICATING EFFECTS OF ABSINTHE AND TOBACCO.—In a recent meeting of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, M. Lucas-Championnière his memoir on exciting the effects of absinthe and tobacco, and the influence of concentration as brandy. Absinthe produces more injurious effects on the animal economy. It causes consecutive convulsions, and he instances upon the nervous system resembles more that of an acrid narcotic poison than that of intoxication by alcohol.

Although one of the greatest dangers of absinthe exists in the adulteration to which it is liable, yet M. Decaisne asserts that even a moderate use of it in great quality is so injurious that the consumption ought to cease entirely. At the same meeting was read a note from M. Gallavardin, descriptive of the intoxicating effects produced on various persons by the application of tobacco leaves to the skin. In the case of a robust peasant, aged twenty-seven, subject to rheumatism, it produced headache, trembling of the limbs, nausea, vomiting, accelerated pulse, &c. Similar effects were produced by the powder of tobacco mixed with butter, by the juice, and by other forms of this narcotic applied to the skin.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN THE HIGHLANDS.

LOCH MUICK.—STATUE OF THE LATE PRINCE CONSORT AT BALMORAL.

As a sequel to the views of Abergeldie Castle, the Highland residence of the Prince of Wales, published in our last, we have engraved, on page 208, one of Loch Muick, likewise from a drawing with which Dr. Stevelink has favoured us. This place was visited by his Royal Highness, with the Princess of Wales and Princess Mary of Cambridge, on Tuesday week. It is within an easy walk of Abergeldie and Balmoral Castles. The Muick stream, which joins the Dee nine miles lower down, at Ballater, spreads at Loch Muick into a considerable sheet of water. The scenery of its shores is rather sombre, except where a more open part admits of the view of the precipitous mountains of Loch Na Gar, which Byron has made so famous. There is a smaller lake than Loch Muick, called Loch Dhu, or Black Loch, three or four miles higher up the stream. Its scenery is even more stern and grand than this. The late Prince Consort had a shooting-lodge at Loch Muick. His attachment to the Scottish Highlands, and his predilection for the sports of deer-stalking and grouse-shooting, which the neighbourhood of Balmoral affords, were constantly exhibited at the present season of each year through-out his life. As a memorial of these tastes and pursuits, which cannot but be gratifying to the Scottish portion of her Majesty's subjects, we have engraved a representation of Mr. Theed's marble statue of that lamented Prince, lately placed in the corridor of Balmoral Castle. He appears here in the Highland costume, equipped for the chase, and accompanied by his favourite deer-hound. The fidelity of the likeness, as well as the spirit and grace of the attitude, set off by a manly and romantic fashion of dress, will sufficiently recommend this statue.

STATUE OF THE LATE PRINCE CONSORT, AT BALMORAL, BY W. THEED.

"RUTH."

THE visitor to the last Spring Exhibition (of works by living artists) at the British Institution will probably remember the picture by Mr. Alexander Johnston engraved on our first page. It occupied a place of honour in the south room, and that deservedly, for there was hardly another equally striking single-figure study in the exhibition. The colouring of this picture is extremely vivid and effective; moreover, the beauty of the "subject" is of a highly attractive kind; and, to employ a French word for which we have no exact equivalent, it is of that entetant description which could not fail to tell to advantage in an exhibition, and to be generally thought irresistibly fascinating. Whether the type of beauty chosen and the expression given by the painter to his "Ruth" realise to the mind the character of the meek, faithful, and loving Moabitish maiden must be left to be decided by the reader's individual taste and feeling. There is a celebrated French painter of whom it is said that he not unfrequently commences a fresh canvas with a number of random slashes, splashes, and blots of colour, that he works up these into whatever subject they may happen to suggest; and that he never once thinks of what title he shall give his picture till it is quite finished. Now, although Turner was suspected of commencing many of his pictures like this French artist, we are not aware that any English figure-painters adopt the same expedient; assuredly, however, some of them must share the Frenchman's uncertainly respecting the christening ceremony. Are there not hosts of beauties in our exhibitions which might stand for any race, except, of course, the brown and black; or represent any Chloe, Phillis, Maud, or other rustic heroine, ancient or modern? And must not mere fancy of necessity in most instances perform the usual office of godfather? In regard to this "Ruth" some might ask for a more Oriental physiognomy (according to modern notions), while others might prefer this more familiar type. Who shall tell us what facial character prevailed in the "country of Moab"? The only possible clue might be looked for in the sculptures of Nineveh. Meanwhile, those who may expect to find everything reminding us of the East in this and similar subjects should consider the fact that the Jews of the present day in Palestine have scarcely any of the traits by which they are recognisable in this country. The appropriateness of the expression of this figure must be judged of still more arbitrarily. Of one thing only the painter places us in certainty by the barley Ruth holds—which is, that he intended to represent the well-remembered incident of the beautiful Old Testament idyl, when the young widow, coming to the land of her adoption—the land of her poor and widowed mother-in-law Naomi, whom she would not forsake—enters the fields of Boaz to glean at the barley harvest, thinking, peradventure, she might "find grace" in the eyes of her rich relative. Of the sequel it is out of our province to speak. But we may venture to add that it is sometimes forgotten that the first son borne by Ruth to Boaz after their marriage was the grandfather of King David, and of course, therefore, the descent is direct from Ruth to the mother of our Saviour.

NEW ADDITIONS TO THE COLLECTION OF THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

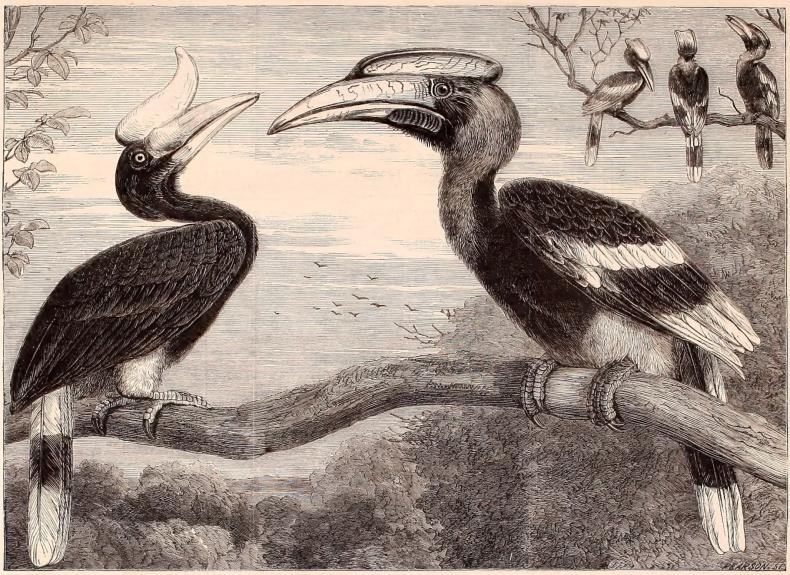
WE lately mentioned that Mr. Thompson, the head keeper of the Zoological Society's Gardens in Regent's Park, had returned from the upper mandible of the bill. In the Boceros rhinoceros it projects like the so-called "horn" of the beast of that name; in the Boceros cavatus it is of a concave shape. They are gregarious birds, and omnivorous in their diet. The colour is partly black and partly a dingy white. The bill is usually about ten inches long.

With respect to the galago, brought from South Africa by Mr. Henry Waghorn, surgeon to the Oxford, Durham, Cambridge, and Dublin Mission, we have received some further information since we published the engraving of that curious little animal a fortnight ago. It was procured by the Rev. Dr. Steer, D.D., who got it from a native on the banks of the Quilimane River. It never belonged to Dr. Livingstone, but was brought to England expressly by Professor Rolleston, of Oxford, who has presented it to the Zoological Society. Mr. Waghorn believes, however, that it is common in the Zambesi country, though he never saw it in the woods on the Mochumbala hills, near Shire, where he was stationed. It is met with in those of the Quar Quar and Quilimane. The natives, who call this animal Jongo, will eat it when they can catch it, as they will eat every other animal, not excepting hyenas, baboons, and monkeys. The galago itself feeds on insects, oranges, guavas, or any acid fruits, but will thrive best with the addition of raw meat. During the voyage Mr. Waghorn fed it upon nothing but meat and milk; it does not drink the milk like a monkey, but laps it up.

PARIS FASHIONS

FOR SEPTEMBER.

FOR some years past—and the present season has not differed in this respect from its modern predecessors—the edicts of the Mode have been issued during the summer excursion period. This is easily explained, from the circumstance that it has now become the general fashion to pass the hot months at the seaside or at watering-places, where ladies are under very slight restraint as to the style of their costume, and can, without being subject to disagreeable remark, temperately adopt any innovation, not to say eccentricity, which the taste of their modistes may suggest. Of all these bold innovations a few sometimes remain, and, once approved, become the mode for a certain time. Thus it was at the watering-places during the present season that the high bonnets recently worn received their coup de congé; and the smallest of small bonnets, having obtained the official approbation of competent judges at Vichy, at Trouville, at Honfleur, and other fashionable resorts, will in all probability reign triumphant for some time to come. We have even seen some that scarcely cover the occiput, merely crinkled in front and on the scarcely perceptible back edge with drooping flowers, instead of the tower-de-tete and bavolet, which are now frequently abandoned. But it must be observed that such chapeaux, although met with in the best houses, are not yet general. Round hats are, however, still numerously patronised in Paris, especially by the foreigners, who are attracted thither by the splendid fêtes in honour of the Emperor and the King of Spain.



During the fine days of September robes of half-season materials may still be ventured upon. The tiers glacé, a light stuff, more durable than barège and easily cleaned, deserves to be placed in the front rank with all the tints of grey alpaca, now very much à la mode. Cream-coloured Irish poplins, for toilette de campagne; or for the seaside, are also very elegant wear, as well as the piqués of Alsatia and Rouen, which are, of course, rather luxury, but have the advantage of enabling the wearer to support the cost season without danger.

Greater demands than ever are now made upon the art of the coiffeur, whose talent is brought into requisition for the arrangement of ladies' hair, false or natural. Curls and catogans are looked upon as perfectly legitimate impositions when the richness of the wearer's chevelure is not sufficient to furnish such capillary ornaments. A quantity of hair, spread out to the best effect, and decorated with flowers or ribbons, is one of the particular marks of the waning summer season.

SCENE OF THE LATE ACCIDENT ON THE NORTH LONDON RAILWAY.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE LATE ACCIDENT ON THE NORTH LONDON RAILWAY.

ON Illustration of the singular accident at the Camden-road station of the North London Railway, on the morning of Tuesday week, shows the place where the engine and tender, after having run upwards of 200 yards on the bye bolder explosion, jumped off the viaduct, a depth of some five-and-thirty feet, descending in a vacant yard below. This yard is a piece of ground belonging to the North London Railway Company, adjoining Randolph-street. There the engine and tender still remained, coupled up with a tarpaulin, at the time our sketch was taken; but they were subsequently removed to the company's depot of rolling stock at Bow. The engine, of course, was a perfect wreck; its chimney was knocked off, the doors of the smoke-box blown off, and its dome crushed in, and that portion of the boiler nearest the fire-box, which was the seat of the explosion, was much injured. The back of the engine, some eight or ten inches in circumference, was snapped off close to the buffer-plank, as it is owing to this separation that the tender keeps on the engine did not drag the train over with it, and thus destroy the lives of a large number of passengers. It was what is termed an outside cylinder tank-engine, with six wheels. The stone coping and a portion of the brickwork of the buttresses at this end of the bridge over Randolph-street, which is formed of wooden girders resting on iron pillars and stanchions, were knocked away by the engine in its fall. As a proof that the engine mounted high into the air and turned completely round in the course of its flight, the top of the telegraph wires of the station, which are some ten or fifteen feet above the line, were broken down, and communication on that particular part of the line was stopped. The passengers were placed in another train and sent forward. So little damage, however, was done to the railway itself that in rather more than a couple of hours the traffic was resumed. The inquest on the unfortunate fireman, William Davis, is adjourned.

THE HUBBERSTON DOCK AT MILFORD HAVEN.

THE foundation-stone of the Hubberston Dock, at Milford Haven, was laid on Thursday, the 11th inst., by Mrs. Potter, the wife of Mr. Richard Potter, chairman of the Great Western Railway Company. This event was looked upon as one of great importance to the inhabitants of the county of Pembroke, which had a few days previously congratulated itself also upon the opening of the new short line of railway from the town of Pembroke to Pembroke Docks, with the prospect of a speedy extension of the railway to Tenby Bay. The place chosen for the site of the new dock is shown in our Illustration. It is a part of the town adjoining the south-west end of Milford. Here, close to the water's edge, a platform had been erected, with a pole at each corner supporting an awning to keep off the rays of the sun, the uprights being covered with evergreens and flowers, and festoons of flowers hung in graceful festoons from the canopy. The stone, a huge block of great weight, was suspended from a pulley and kept in an immovable position by ornamental wedges. At the entrance to the platform a triumphal arch had been erected, bearing the motto, "Success to the Docks." At the hour appointed, a procession was formed, headed by the band of the Milford Volunteers, whose soldier-like appearance was much admired. The volunteers were followed by the corporation and other seniors, the Mayors, Aldermen, and Town Councillors of Haverfordwest and Pembroke, the Old Fellows and Freemasons, and many inhabitants of Milford and the neighbourhood. The procession was terminated by the carriage of Mr. William Rees, of Scovestone, in which were seated Mr. Richard Potter and his wife Mrs. Potter. Having arrived at the site of the proposed works, the volunteers formed line on both sides of the road, from leading to the platform. Mrs. Potter, carrying a bouquet of flowers in her hands, walked down to the stage leaning upon the arm of Colonel Greville, who wore the full uniform of the corps. Mr. Potter and his colleagues and other ladies and gentlemen followed. Then came the Freemasons, who were followed by the Old Fellows and others. The band played a lively air. The shores and approaches were crowded by hundreds of persons congregating upon every available point from which a view of the proceedings could be obtained, boats, with a great many of every kind studded the water, forming an animated and attractive scene. The chairman of the works, Mr. Rees, of Scovestone, called upon the Chaplain to the Western Province of Freemasons, the Rev. Mr. Harrison, to perform the proceedings with a prayer. The stocks were removed from beneath the stone, and a silver trowel, with a suitable inscription, was handed to Mrs. Potter, who took up some mortar from off the mallet held by Mr. Milnes, the contractor, and placed it beneath the four corners of the block, which was then lowered amid cheers and declared by the Deputy Grand Superintendent, the National Anthem. The Grand Master of the Masonic body then handed some corn, wine, and oil to Mrs. Potter, which she deposited on the stone; the corn was presented as a tastefully constructed cornucopia, the wine and oil in silver vases, with the masonic ornaments allowed by the Old Fellows' regulations. Mrs. Potter then mounted the block and said a few words on behalf of his wife, expressing the best wishes for the prosperity of this important commercial undertaking and of the whole district. The people responded with many rounds of hearty cheering for Mr. Potter and his family. After which Mr. Dunlop, the procession was again formed to return to the Lord Nelson Hotel, in the town of Milford. The band again struck up, and upon taking the horses out of the carriage in which Mr. Potter had to ride, and drawing it back themselves. A banquet for the ladies and gentlemen of the company was laid out in the ball-room of the Lord Nelson Hotel, where Mr. G. Lort Phillips presided. With respect to the place called Hubberston, we find a description of it in Fenton's Tour round and Milford Haven Telegraph. It refers to an old and strange prophecy which, for that period of several years ago — "the prediction or legend was found, in the latter half of the 16th century," in an old draw-well within the ruins of Pill Priory, and the monkish Latin rhyme, which was inscribed on the stone, is interpreted somewhat as amongst them by a Mr. Hosford, who gave it publicity in one of a series of pamphlets entitled, "A Tour of a Gentleman in search of a Fetpiece." Amongst other things at that time equally hard to be understood and difficult of interpretation, it was predicted that when the highest arch of the bridge should be elevated in the house of God, a great town should be built on the Pill of the Dale, and with every stone that should be placed in the chants from every clime should come, like bees to the flowers. Years after that the highest part of the East,' the topmost of 'Orient' blown up at Aboukir, was purchased by Nelson to the Hon. Charles Greville, and was subsequently placed across the roof of the chancel of the new church at Milford; and now on the 17th of the month Hubba's Pill or Hubberstone, the first stone of the Milford Docks has been laid, the work to be executed under the commercial greatness of Milford. It is no part of our present purpose to question or to doubt the faith of those who have the confident capabilities of our mineral bones to believe that when docks and wharves are constructed, a great town will rapidly be built around the Pill, to which the merchants and the commerce of the world shall come."

The Commissioners of Customs have issued a general order to the collectors at the various ports that a provision of the instructions from the Lords of the Treasury, "no ship of war belonging to either of the belligerent Powers of North America shall be allowed to enter any of the harbours, ports for the purpose of being dismantled or sold."

The Times has the following remarks on the proposed British American Confederation:—"In point of territory, British America exceeds Government would be able to govern so extensive countries in the world. It is impossible to state the area with accuracy, because many parts have been only imperfectly surveyed or explored; but it may, as all events, be taken that Newfoundland contains 40,200 square miles (many persons believe the number to be much greater); Prince Edward Island is 2,173 square miles; New Brunswick, 27,322; Nova Scotia, 18,660; Canada (according to Sir W. Logan), 230,000; Hudson's Bay territory, 2,500,000; British Columbia, 200,000; Vancouver Island, 15,000; making together 2,993,478 square miles—a larger area than that of the United States (if there should be such a country now), and approaching the size of Europe. The boundaries of British North America may be taken to exceed 11,000 miles. But if for the present the proposed confederacy stop short at the 49th Parallel, it would embrace a territory more extensive than those of France, Italy, Portugal, and Greece added together, and equal to Germany and Spain united."

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

THAT "half a loaf is better than no bread at all" is a proverb, the truth of which no Englishman thinks of doubting, and of which certain American statesmen begin to perceive the truth. It is all very well for contractors for the commissariat of an immense army, and for such recruiting officers whose pleasant duties lead them away from the front, to tell us that "War is the better end;" but for those in the front, poor fellows! the better end has indeed arrived; and, in justice to their good taste, it must be said that they do not relish it. To strike ten thousand dead in one week—of whom three fifths die by war and the rest by cholera—is an act for which no Government can be applauded, unless it is gilded by the sunshine of success. But in the land flames about Petersburg—nay, even at Atlanta and Mobile—there is indeed no real glimmer of that blessed sunshine which we all worship. Foreseeing this, we have for some weeks caught at the faintest gleam of hope, and have thought that we heard a louder every day, and which must eventually make themselves heard. Amongst the "Signs of the Times" of the "Seasons" there is one upon which even Thomson never wrote, and that is, that horrid word succeeding golden autumn, does give a pause to the operations of war, and grant the tormented what is called "a respite."

Come, gentle Spring, ethereal mildness, come, cries Thomson, impatient of Winter; but now we would substitute autumn for spring. Autumn is generally the time for the most decisive battles; winter that even split the frozen toes, brittle as icicles, from the feet of backwoodsmen, so that it would only give a respite to the operations which could bring better thoughts to both parties. It will be to the credit of our Government if, with a tender and delicate hand, it urges its good offices to reach both sides. The dove is about to fly from the ark: may it not be furnished with an olive-leaf from this Isle of Liberty?

Out of evil comes good. Everyone knows that our best books are reprinted in America, because our duty is a high figure, whereas it amounts to a prohibition; the same is the case now with our papers, and publishers and rich people can alone afford to buy them. There is a talk of reprinting Punch in New York, and there is no doubt of there, and also of reprinting many of the best articles from our daily papers and leaving them in a permanent form. The success of a long time been pursued with our magazines, and has the advantage of saving our country the benefit of a calmer style and of English thoughts. It cannot fail to do good if we can persuade those who have our free criticism so calmly as we take them, notably let us say, of Emerson and Longfellow, that they are not to be read with impunity. So susceptible, however, is the Yankee mind, that we hear that in New York a new paper, called "The Sentinel," is to be started, and all anti-American reflections of that mild and popular series of essays are to be carefully removed. Let us hope that this will not be the case with all our articles plagiarised by Americans.

A paragraph from one of the foreign correspondents concerning the events of Lisbon has appeared in the Times, and is the talk of many of our contemporaries. It is to this effect, that when the fire was raging at its utmost all heads, very naturally, rushed to the rescue. Soldiers and citizens worked with equal enthusiasm, and the chief of the staff, the General and his Staff were on the spot all night; the Mayor, the Prefect, the Bishop and Archbishop were all there, and almost all the place, were there, encouraging the people, and united in every helpful endeavour to stop the ravages of the fire. This was during the night. Now, the next morning, there is a new and hungry and thirsty vigil, save a new element of aid approach them. "About nine o'clock this morning," says the writer, "the Municipal Council round the scene of the fire, carrying the relics of St. Aurelius and St. Martial in an immense gilt shrine. The Bishop and Archbishop were also with this. The correspondent does not tell us whether the doubtful aids of questionable saints were more efficacious than fire-engines, nor does he inform us whether the Archbishop was aware that the relics of the extinct might put out the "element" reporters fondly call the devouring. The Bishop of Algarve, Archbishop St. Aurelius and Iaste Archdeacon, Manning as "having a peculiar facility for removing difficulties which might encompass the Protestant mind." Let us confess to somewhat of a difficulty in St. Aurelius and St. Martial really could put out the fire, why were they not brought out at least twelve hours before?

The remains—if we consider these mural reminiscences valuable—the interesting remains of a celebrated Milton, near Rochester, have been removed during last week. We do not, as the Greeks do, value our poets residences. Was it not from that very house that Milton composed the most sublime of his writings? A monument was intended to the sly," commencing "Captain, or colonel, or knight-in-arms, whose chance on these defenceless doors may seize," and building him

Lift not his spear against the Muses' bower:
The great Emathian conqueror bid spare
The house of Pindarus.

Milton, indeed, seems to have been fully aware of his genius, and he tells the captain or colonel that he "can spread his name o'er land and sea." But what is the monument? Why, a wall! and on the ground this muse's bower is no one of more fame than the clerk of the works of the builder and contractor—let us say, to his honour, a very appreciative gentleman, who called attention to the value of the demolition of the relic, and who has shown polite attention to those who choose to visit the spot. It is to be hoped that a memorial, in one case, of a house much more authentic than that of Shakspeare at Stratford, in the other case let us hope that a memorial more to believe, let us note that the martyr's church of St. Bartholomew the Great, West Smithfield, said to be the oldest church in London, is about to be restored, and that, under the superintendence of a committee, the names of the members of which assure us of its competency for the task, the restoration is begun.

A new rival to the immortal Mr. Punch has been projected and will appear, we believe, when the reading season sets in, a staff of competent artists and one of the best comic writers have been engaged, and will be under the control of a gentleman well known in literature, and who possesses, we hear, the most extraordinary vein of dry humour which few can resist. All power to his elbow: in literature as in politics a good opposition is necessary and beneficial to the public, and the wits of Mr. Punch may be sharpened by the existence of a rival worthy of him; for, to say the truth, although it has been, and is, a capital work, it has of late years at that blooming patriarch, his rivals have been but very weak things, and unfortunately have not had the advantage of being well known to the public. Mr. Sala has written for one of the American magazines a monograph on Robson, the actor, full of his own peculiar views and original diction. In it the writer had begun by saying "once more a hale and valid man;" but his hope will never be realised. A paragraph has reached us that the proposed monograph will be shortly published. It is preceded by introductory matter by another hand, in which we hear that Mr. Robson's true name was Thomas Robson Brownbill, and that he assumed the name of Frederick, "which is considered decidedly stylish and out of the common—it may be added very unlike the usual genitlemen of the profession." The Smellie, printer and engraver, to whom Robson was apprenticed, was a Scotch gentleman, a relative, we believe, of Smellie—also a printer and philosopher—of whom Lord Brougham speaks in his "Lives of Philosophers."

The celebrated letters on agrarian matters by the Times' Bee Master are about to be republished. And who is the Times Bee Master? asks the public. Who is he who gave us that nice little treatise upon those armed but industrious republicans who preserve a monarch, and that very pretty and poetical description of the bee, extracted from Æsop to Shakspeare, have been learned? His name is a celebrated one, he is a divine, and not only a divine, but a polemic. Crowds go to hear him, even Ministers of State and ladies of title; and when he publishes his sermons thousands buy them. He is a popular expounder and——" Why," exclaims a fair reader, running down this column in the corner of a railway carriage, "I do declare it's that darling Mr. Spurgeon! Oh, how interesting to think that he should take up the study of bees!" No; it is not Mr. Spurgeon; he is not Cæsar—it is Pompey. We all know how very much alike they are said to be. The Times Bee Master is a divine only one degree less popular than Mr. Spurgeon, and that is—Dr. Cumming. The name will be a surprise to most of my readers, and those most surprised will bear unbiased witness to the charm of style and freshness which the Doctor had put in his new but well-studied subject.

FINE ARTS.

THE ARUNDEL SOCIETY.

THE growing success of this society is a fact, the significance of which will be acknowledged with much gratification by all lovers of art, but which cannot be too strongly impressed upon artists. The recent limitation of the number of members demonstrates that there is a large and increasing public eager to possess reproductions of those early works of pure and severe character which were executed when art was the handmaid only of religion. Let, then, painters (and even that not unimportant class for good or evil—picture-dealers) understand that there is a demand for something above the puerile or meretricious staple of our exhibitions, if the supply be adapted to meet the requirements of that large section of the public who must now be credited with a more refined taste.

The improvement in the finances of the Arundel Society has enabled the council to overtake the subscriptions—that is to say, instead of the publications being many months in arrear, they are now issued to members of a current year about the season of that year. As far more important result of the society's progress is, however, the great increase (chiefly from the enormous contributions of "Associate") of the funds available for procuring copies of those invaluable old Frescoes and other paintings, so many of which, in Italy especially, are, from various causes, hastening to decay. The formation of a collection of drawings from important monuments of painting, which, it was thought, might be published, would be available for illustration and study, was," says the last report, "one of the recommended objects of the society." Already this object has been so well carried out that the collection of nearly 400 drawings, &c., illustrative of early Italian art, as the society's rooms, New Bond-street, is scarcely to be paralleled for its comprehensiveness. As the enhancement of this object, the society has lately employed an additional copyist—Mr. Schultz, whose drawings, of very requisite qualification, if we may judge by his minutely-faithful transcripts of Fra Angelico's "Crucifixion;" the "Nativity of the Virgin," by Andrea del Sarto; and the "Last Supper," by Ghirlandaio, all from the Frescoes in those Churches. Mr. Schultz has also copied the famous triptych by Memling, in the Hospital of St. John, at Bruges, for the Arundel collection, also, the transfer his drawings to the stone for printing, an advantage the society will be enabled to secure. A specimen chromo-lithograph of the Memling triptych is to be given (which will form part of the publications for next year), executed under these favourable circumstances, is likely to produce the result surpasses, in force and fidelity of characterisation, everything hitherto produced by the process. The faithfulness of the chromo-drawings, even to the evidences of decay in the originals, may remove, to a certain extent, the objections to the Arundel publications that they are "restorations." It should, however, be borne in mind that, if reduced scale and mechanical process of chromolithography are as incapable of the delicacies of expression as the original condition of decay, as of rendering the distinctive character of a painter's execution. The attempt to represent by such means the present state of any particular work would probably be more misleading and more damaging to the fame of any old painter than any modern "restoration" could possibly be. Only one who has seen the actual condition of nearly all the early frescoes in Italy can have any idea how well that the best "restored" by means of chromolithography, only pretend to represent the general character of those works, and that the best chance of doing this must be by publishing as much as possible of the parts of decay. And such persons, if acquainted also fully with the nature of chromolithography, must be perfectly aware that to ask a chromolithographer to imitate, in any early fresco, the mechanical process. To expect such verisimilitudes would, in fact, be as reasonable as to ask (though the two are seen seriously required) for the luminous quality of fresco, a quality which, observed in the finest works of which we are acquainted, is dependent upon the crystallisation of the pellicle thrown up by lime, and which is consequently impossible on paper with simple water colours.

There must be, we find it necessary to assume, many misapprehensions regarding the execution of the early Italian painters among amateurs who, from fashion or inclination, have taken fancy lately to be mediævalists. For our part, we have no hesitation in saying that "handling" as self-assertion is the last idea of consideration amongst earlier than in the works of Titian. Even as late as Michael Angelo, and notwithstanding his impatient temperament, effects of shading were given in fresco by a series of hatched "stumps" in which that which nothing can be more mechanical and conventional. As regards Raphael's frescoes, they have been so much garbled and spoiled as to be able to form any safe opinion of their original condition. But, even if the cartoons of the early painters were worthy of reproduction, it cannot be too strenuously urged that their great claim upon our esteem and admiration resides, not in their manipulative qualities, but in their composition, their feeling of conception and beauty, and their freedom from all technical display and self-assertion. And of these characteristics a chromolithograph can give no idea, even though it would fall utterly in giving any notion of the brushwork of Titian, Rubens, Rembrandt, or Velasquez.

The Arundel Society's publications for the present year consist of engravings as well as chromolithographs. Of the former, the most important is a fine line engraving, by Professor Gruner, of the Conversion of Saul," from a pencil-drawing by Signor Conconi after Raphael's tapestry in the Vatican. This copy was made from a cartoon, which is now lost, but which belonged to the famous series at Hampton Court. Like the rest of the Arazzi in the Vatican, though worked at Arras, under the direction of Bernard Orley, the able pupil of Raphael, then resident in Flanders, this tapestry cannot be regarded as representing nearly so correctly the cartoons executed by his own hands with the assistance only (probably) of Francesco Penni in the accessories, especially those of a more ornamental kind. There is, however, assurance in this tapestry, curiously noticeable in the drawing of the mouths of all the figures, and the face of the Saviour, especially in the clouds in which the apostle is anything but satisfactory. Nevertheless, it is a valuable example of the school later style, on account of the boldness of the composition and foreshortenings, and interesting from its connection with the Hampton Court series. A line-engraving, from a fresco of St. John the Evangelist in a lunette of the chapel of Pope Nicholas V., in the Vatican—one of the series painted by Fra Angelico—will be issued to members of the year in the sumptuous of all painters.

The large chromolithograph for the year is from a fresco by Luini—"The Presentation in the Temple," or, as it is otherwise called, "The Purification of the Virgin"—one of the series (from which two others have been published by the society) in the church of the Santuario della Madonna di Saronno, about fifteen miles from Milan. The same church contains other valuable frescoes by the same painter, and, as the whole are in excellent preservation, the society cannot justly be charged, as regards them, with any considerable "restoration." The fresco now presented is the completely representative as could be chosen of the general scheme and character of a Renaissance religious work—a multi-picture composition, as it does, in that of a traditional representation, but amplified into a grand composition of many figures and groups, and enriched with a splendid architectural background in the revived classic style. The chromolithograph from this is, as regards the subject, one of the most important and valuable hitherto published; but it is deficient in that warmth of variety of colour, and certain clumsiness of drawing, which cannot be charged to so graceful an artist as Luini, and are not observed in the chief Milanese follower of the great Leonardo, and where works are often mistaken for those of Da Vinci himself. The last fresco, however, is that of Gaudenzio, that of St. Joseph, though he is here represented, contrary to precedent, as a young man, chromolithographed "on the scale and in exact imitation of the original," completes the ordinary subscription publication of the year.

The "extra" or "occasional" publications which the council of the society have either issued or contemplate issuing consist of chromolithographs of "The Coronation of the Virgin," from a fresco by Fra Angelico; "St. James the Less before Herod Agrippa," from a fresco by Andrea Mantegna in the church of the Eremitani, at Padua, together with others from the works, as already named, copied by Mr. Schultz, and the two frescoes by Luini at Saronno, "Christ Among the Doctors" and "The Marriage of the Virgin."

CURRENT LITERATURE.

About in the World. By the Author of "The Gentle Life." (1 vol. Sampson Low, Son, and Marston.) The author modestly intimates a great share of the success which attended a former volume of essays from his pen to "the excellent printing, clear type, and presentable appearance" for which it was inherited by its publishers. To present volume has been equally well treated by the publishers, for a more sightly little book it would be difficult to find in a summer-day's quest, and we should not be surprised to hear that it has been equally well appreciated by the public. Its contents are multiform, but they consist chiefly of short essays in pleasing, simple style upon social topics. The author propounds no startling theories and indulges in no dangerous originality; he is eminently "safe;" he reflects the orthodox views of the comfortable classes; he is perfectly orthodox on cheerful views of the conduct of life and of human philosophy, in the subjects of self-help and composure; and in these numerous leges he appears to us likely to find great favour with those numerous leges of her Majesty who affect "the small ten-party." He is evidently an industrious reader, and the results of his reading furnish him either with matter for discussion, or with auxiliary argument, or with apt quotation, or with humorous allusion, or with witty illustration, or even with a substitute for spontaneous thought. He has clearly included the Scriptures amongst his studies; but his acquaintance with them is of the popular and unscientific, for he writes at page 103 :—"Let us remember the rebuke, that they upon whom the tower in Siloam fell were not the only guilty ones (Luke xiii.)," whereas St. Luke, and the geographies, and the maps place Siloam in the immediate neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and to mention Siloam in the immediate neighbourhood of Jerusalem, in a question of that a Jew would have readily acknowledged that, in a question of sinners, there was little choice between one Samaritan and another. He is a great advocate for "proper words," and, on his own principle, we are inclined to agree with him; but when he says (p. 224), "A polite miss would not cut something pleasant, something to cheer the old fellow; a complimentary nan would, most likely, venture on a smooth word—a fib, perhaps, to compliment the oil genius—but, although rather truth might suffer, a polite miss would not think the last man the wisest and best," we take exception both to his (implied) doctrine and to his grammar; for, in the first place, a true gentleman would probably be cheered into believing he was stronger than he really was, and into attempting something detrimental rather than to fail; and, in the second place, the use of the superlative is wrong, as the comparison is between two persons. It were paltry to harass an author on such a common grammatical inaccuracy, but it cause so conveniently to hand that there was no avoiding an allusion to it, and it is unfortunately on the only one in which the author has erred. We read, for instance, at p. 199, "Many months have now elapsed since the [Jubilee] &c.," when it is plain that the writer means "we cannot but admire;" and this error is becoming so frequent, especially in periodical and daily newspapers, that it should be protested against wherever it is met with. It is a pleasanter duty to bear our willing witness to the usefulness of lesse, the evenness of temper, the brightness of style, and the intermixture of amusing anecdote which are to be found in our author's essays.

Denis Donne. By A. Thomas. (3 vols. Tinsley.) There is a certain, and perhaps a very large, class of persons who will read this novel with great pleasure, for it is smart in style and often piquant in dialogue; it deals with millinery and hair-dressing and their concomitants in that full and detailed fashion which is so important in the estimation of many, if not of most, women dressed; and it verges, so far as the incidents are concerned, on sensationalism. But the tells over again almost the whole story of Parisina; and, though the tells over again almost the whole story of Parisina; and, though the heroine possesses much beauty and much charm, she is nevertheless pursuer-tempered, highly-bred English maiden, with a peculiar passion—her his peculiarest not being exhibited by himself, but being taken for granted on the author's testimony; the ethic is an adventuress, who by a mixture of subtlety and boldness, by much insight into an instrument whereby she joins herself in holy matrimony to a peer of the realm. There is little or no plot; the story is told somewhat flatly, the language is more remarkable for smartness, flippancy, and flourish than for grammatical accuracy, elegance, and simplicity; and if any lesson be learned to be learned from the story it must be that a young married woman who is beautiful, vain, frivolous, heartless, and wealthy will come, and deserves to come, to grief sooner or later; but a young unmarried woman who is beautiful, bold, calculating, and poor, may indulge in questionable practices without any wreck on a poor, may indulge in questionable practices without any wreck on a result to secure a good marriage—may contemplate the breakage of her marriage vows—may yet have a heart "to the full as warm as the majesty of woman's"—may have, in fact, all the virtues that mortification and disappointment" which arise when she finds her projected paramour has escaped from her toils, and she is "indeed" left "stranded on a rock," and may settle down into a faithful wife. The former part of the lesson is wholesome enough, but the latter could, a perilous course, for "there's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip."

The History of Louth. (1 vol. Louth: W. Shepherd.) A lover of Louth, in an enthusiastic mood, has compiled from the most trustworthy sources an interesting sketch of the history of Louth from the days of Edward the Confessor to the day when Albert Edward, Prince of Wales, married the Princess Alexandra of Denmark; and he, vogue, and has produced a history of the orthodox Indian form of aims on all public occasions were distributed amongst 1,300 poor women. Other items best known to antiquarians are, for antiquity, its historical associations, its compactness, its cleanliness, its well-lighted and well-paved streets, its convenience in the midst of its well-lighted and well-paved streets, its convenience in the midst of its well-lighted and well-paved streets, its convenience in the midst of call the inspired pencil of the great Turner. The author has put little volume seems to think that some apology is necessary for what he has undertaken; but he appears to us to have wrought both an entertaining and a useful work; for concise, straightforward, readably-written little books, such as he has composed, are exactly what the majority of persons, together with their busy household tendencies, desire to have.

Le Roman d'un Homme Sérieux. Par Charles de Moüy. (Hachette et Cie.) It is well to publish such books as this in a country where it is customary to believe that every amusing French book is also improper. An idea is prevalent amongst most Englishmen and Englishwomen that a French book must be either dry or naughty; that there is no middle course between the two. Here is M. Paul Simon and the license of M. Poul de Kock; but this little tale will disabuse them of the notion. It is a story more than usually pleasant, told in pure and simple language, and with a healthy moral. The tale is poor enough in plot and incident, and the open manner in which the dowry-hunting is conducted appears not only revolting but untrue to nature; the style, however, is very fresh and lively, and full of that piquancy for which the French language is the incomparable vehicle.

Our Common Insects. By Mrs. E. W. Cox. (1 vol. Robert Hardwicke.) An extremely elementary little treatise upon entomology. Mrs. Cox, with great modesty and candour, confesses the meagreness of her work, and declares her object to be merely a desire to incite her readers to a study of more copious and more pretentious writers upon the subject. What she has written, however, is nicely put together, and will be found by those who know nothing of entomology sufficiently interesting to excite a wish for further information, if not an inclination for personal inspection of the forms, habits, merits, and demerits of the most numerous class of living creatures. The woodcuts with which the pages are illustrated are of themselves sufficient to make the little volume valuable.

The Physical Geology and Geography of Great Britain. By A. C. Ramsay, LL.D. (1 vol. Edward Stanford.) The time is fast approaching when a knowledge of geology, at any rate to an elementary extent, will be considered almost as necessary as a knowledge of arithmetic, and we therefore gladly welcome a second edition of so instructive a little work as that before us may justly claim to be. The present edition has undergone a careful revision and correction, has been in parts rewritten, and deserves, therefore, even more attention than its predecessor received.

The House among the Hills. (1 vol. Smith, Elder, and Co.) The first of several novels which we have received in this month of August, the hero of which has no connection with either house or hills. They all, however, have a common tinge of sadness, and can be strongly recommended to those who like to be moved to tears by a pathetic conclusion. Many of them display depth of feeling, play of fancy, and harmonious versification; and though rarely all three combined in the simple piety.

The Official Illustrated Guide to the London and South-Western Railway and to the Isle of Wight. By George Measom. (1 vol. G. Griffin and Co.) Excursionists and holiday-makers will find this a very useful guide and companion. It is, in a manner of information—historical, statistical, and geographical; it abounds with judicious criticism (for the satisfaction, no doubt, of the sentimental traveller), and it is profusely illustrated.

Famous Regiments of the British Army. By W. H. Davenport Adams. (1 vol. Walter Scott.) Mr. Adams, in this volume is "sketched the career of the Royals, the Buffs, the Black Watch, the Connaught Rangers, the Scots Greys, the Royal Irish, the Welsh Fusiliers, the 4th Foot, and the Guards." It will be seen, therefore, that "famous regiments" does not mean "the regiments which have the most glorious records," and that about the "dirty old half hundred," better known as the "Fighting Fifth," and about other—or indeed, we might say all the other—regiments of the British Army, but Mr. Adams was confined to a narrow selection, and he has not made an unhappy one. There is an agreeable combination in the biographical sketches of certain eminent English Generals, and there are illustrations by Mr. A. B. Fisher. We must congratulate Mr. Fisher upon his truthfulness of attention to detail. He has not forgotten the gaiters of which he has not forgotten to place the never-failing surcoated with a pearmaltoon. He has not forgotten the "pipe-clay" of the period; but we imagine there is, in the breasts of our boys and our youth, sufficient warlike ardour to make them peruse with avidity the history of our "famous regiments."

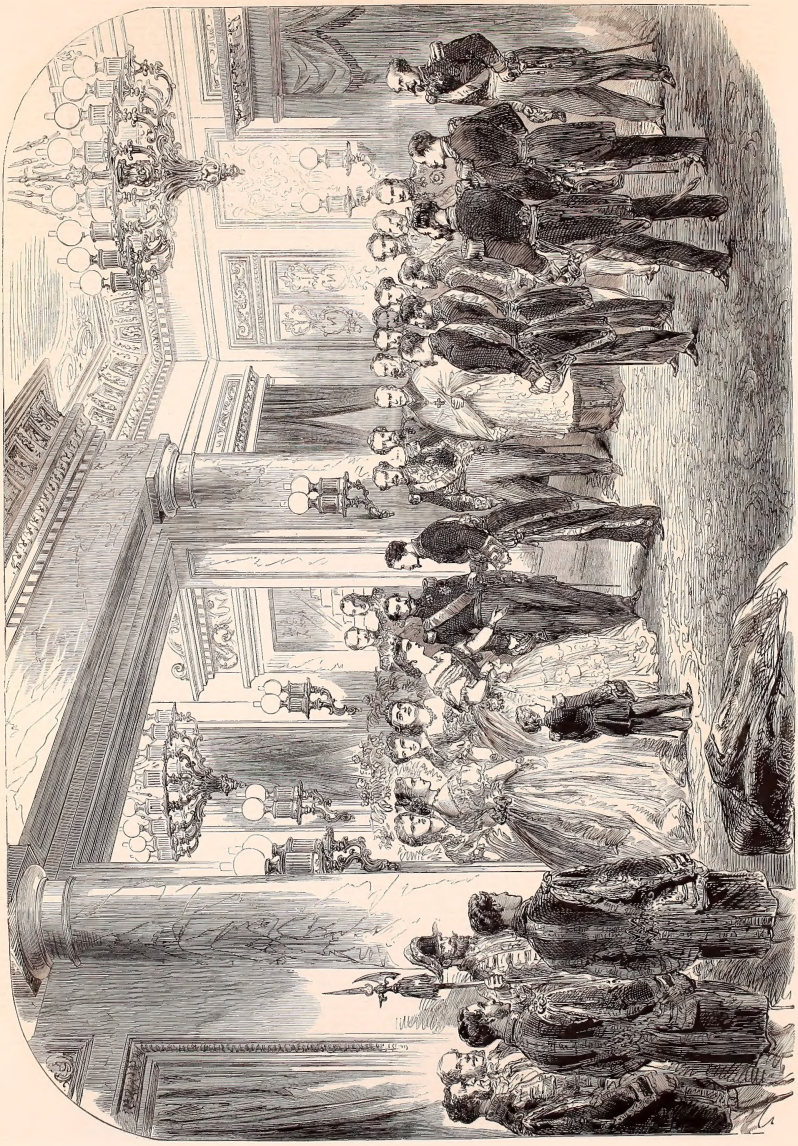
THE FARM.

THE Shetlands have caught the prevailing inspiration at last, and held their first cattle show on Thursday last week, which was attended by very excellent and rugged roads, while others had to be put into boats and ferried over the countless voes with which these islands abound. The show was held on the Gressy Loan, in the Scott district, to those signs of the times which have just culminated in 355. 6d. for the top bull calf, and 30s. in Lockerby and 27s. for the best heifer calf, both at Melrose. For several years past the Scotsdown, the Leicester, and the Cheviot have been steadily imported, and of late the Wiltshire, and now the Suffolk, have travelled from Scottish conquest into these northern seas. The Highland Society gave prizes for cattle and sheep in the county of Renwick. The entries were generally pretty good; but the pig part of the exhibition dwindled down to a "clean" class for sows and gilts, and a class for "any other" "old original" cattle and ponies of the islands also mustered well.

The Shetland cattle have been for many generations after generation, with no perceptible improvement, and a three-year-old wether fetches from about five to eight shillings. The sheep are gradually becoming appreciated in Scotland; and Professor Aytoun, who is sheriff in these parts, said that he had got a Shetland sheep, which was killed last week, and the barrel of beef I get annually for winter use from Shetland." The quays from three years old to five years old average about 10s. more, as they are rather more scarce. Milch cows, which are very long in coming to maturity, are in very great demand, and 10 to 12 years of age, if they will make up to 2l. 10s. for the fleshier, sinking offal. Their power of making food is also very great, and a cow will live on a small patch of land imported to the Lothians at 5l. 10s. in October, and more than doubling their price by the following August. Some of the finest cattle in Shetland are bred for home consumption. The pony demand for the mines and general use has considerably slackened off since the Act was passed that "no" ponies "got" exported. It was well that there was a bill, so very few aged ponies were left in the islands. A two-year-old filly will make 3l. 10s., and a four-year-old 5l. An aged mare and 4l. 7s. for an aged horse puny is about the market quotation. Heights vary from 36 to 42 inches. Many of these ponies are "clean" bred, and, though they will not bear be true, the native Shetlanders are in complete bondage to the merchants, who "run" the islands. The inhabitants, as a rule, never receive any money for their wool, or their manufactures, or the ponies, or anything else, but are entirely paid in goods, and the merchants are the only "bank" in the islands. The amount of a few shillings is given on the security of a foal and so on from year to year, till it is sold at the end of the year, and the account squared. Such is the eyes. What with this system and that of "halvers mares"—which consists in a partnership between the farmer and the merchant—the farms might be let at a rent, the latter—this quiet, uncomplaining race of people are "always in two."

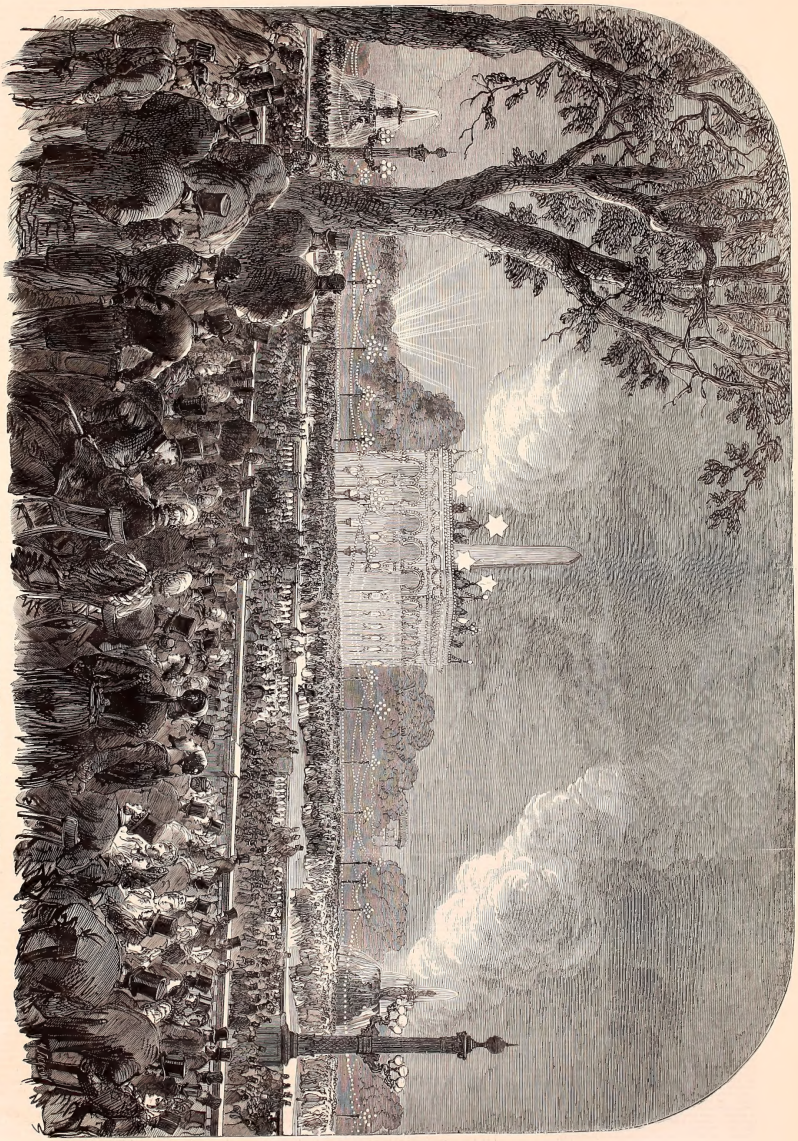
The Orkney farmers lost their original race of cattle and sheep, and they need not mourn them. Some of the native sheep have crossed remarkably well with the Cheviot, and the Orkney cattle with Devon bull has been in these islands for many a long year; but the Orkney and the other day that a Suffolk was introduced from Mr. Lumsden. Orkney and Shetland alone exported about 1,000 head of cattle last year, of which Leith received and Aberdeen, and no doubt formed part of the wondrous dead meat trains from that great beef metropolis, which carried 1,000 tons in 1892-3, at a cost of 1l. per ton. Much nutrition formed a very insignificant proportion. No wonder that Sir James Riphinstone, in alluding to the Orkney and Shetland Bill, said that the principle that it forgets the breeding part of business, should express hopes that a much larger cattle trade would be opened up with the Orkneys. Horseflesh, we say, adds in very cheap there, and one farmer assured us that animals which would have fetched 5.36 during the Russian War would not now bring 2l. 10s.

We spoke of Caithness in our last. The mail and the Defiance, the Aberdeen steamers, have been doing a fine season, which has succeeded that crazy craft at Meikle Ferry, have made the journey of very easy from Caithness to Tain, the most delightful part of the mails. The cattle trade, as usual, is not quite an average season for lambs in Sutherlandshire, as they had to undergo every vexation of bad weather, cold and excessive drought. In consequence of the latter, the barley seemed thin and short in the straw, and the hay crop not one half. Even the heather had suffered dreadfully from it. The death of Mr. Gunn, of Glendiho, from a gig fully from it. The death of Mr. Gunn, of Glendiho, from a gig accident, had caused very deep lamentation in the county. No man was better known or respected on the "plane chaus," at the great Inverness Weol Fair, and not to know the name was to know nothing about Sutherlandshire. These things are generally kept pretty close, but he was supposed to have about 9000 sheep on his farm, which is kept on by the family. He had lately added largely to the number of his sheep with olive and castor oil, instead of butter and tar; but we believe that he had not many followers on this point among the flockmasters, who considered that, however much it might improve the quality of the wool, it lessened its weight, and did not turn the rain so well. The wethers throughout Sutherlandshire this year have been generally sold at an advance of 1s. 6d. to 2s. above last year, and ewes at about the same. The highest price we heard of, for wethers, was 54s 6d by the clad score, and 1l0 less for ewes.



Messrs. Murray and Cameron seem to have been at the head of the cross cattle classes at the recent show in the Black Isle; and Balmadathy (who has introduced Florist the sire of Forth, Royal Towerley, and other pure shorthorns into the isle) won with his Leicesters, and Mr. Mackay with the cross. All along the coast the crops were looking well, on the whole; but about Nairnshire things were rather burnt up. In Aberdeenshire the farmers were not so much in want of rain, and spoke of having had a better grass season than usual. The new Scottish Central line seems likely, at last, to touch the Aberdeen granite, and will open a point upon which he has hitherto manifested a truly sublime indifference—and to open up a good deal of Kincardineshire, which is now inaccessible. The Christmas Fat Association which was established last year at Keyes brought together about 200 beasts, and the cattle shows had prizes for the best lot of ten, six, four, and so on. Mr. Harries had the prize for the best bullock, and is reported to have a good chance for that prize again. In Aberdeenshire the first prize was won twice, to two which were in calf, and therefore returned to the place whence they came, the sooner this infant association learns the vices of its Islington and Birmingham compeers and takes to the road on the "no admittance principle—"No Cows no prize"—the sounder will be its prosperity. Its cardinal idea seems a very good one. The shorthorn breeders are beginning to talk of the Highland Society's Show to-morrow week, and are some good bulls, cows, and heifers, all of them local prize and medal winners, to be taken for the Aberdeen Caledonian to try if it is these counties, and therefore the Duke of Devonshire is reducing his flock of them and increasing the number of his Leicester ewes. This week we have had to say that the less than eighty Leicesters fell to sell. The Gordon Castle Herd has been strengthened by the purchase of the two-year-old bull Yarn from Sir Sibbald, and the only English judge in the trio, selected for the first prize. But the Englishman and the Scot have a wonderful reading of a Leicester and the latter holds fast to the Border type.

We met with what may possibly be an Islington candidate from Banffshire in the form of a Shorthorn heifer, which was shown at the Imperial Rome and a poll cow; and we found them still discussing the great question of the Highland Show to be visited by Queen Ida cup, which went for the first time into the Garioch district, was rightly decided or not. The general impression was decidedly against the pick which did fall to the lot of Mr. Mackie's Jock Scott, which has just been sold into Nairnshire for something like 150. Mr. Moir's three-year-old, and his two-year-old Sweetheart, is a great beauty, but with hardly the scale of the last year's cup-taker, which was also Mr. Forty. Aberdeenshire Polled Angus is increasing in size in "racing bullocks," and many speak quite as highly of Mr. Martin's grey shorthorn and West Highland cross bullock, as they do of his Aberdeen-Angus, which has purchased the cup and Mr. Walker's prize bull Fox Maule for the shambles. A more perfectly-formed one never entered a show-yard than the latter, but he was but a weedy small. Mr. M'Combie won with his four-year-old and yearling bullocks at Aberdeen, but did not bring out his best, which is rather an unusual card, and is to be met with in most districts difficult to feel that he and his man John ever took in hand. He has about 200 young beasts on hand at Leckmelm and Ardross, and they are just beginning to take them in from the pastures, where they have been up to their eyes in clover, on to boxes and sheds. The young stock are very promising, clean, small, and several capital greys; but his main strength is, as usual, in "the heavy blacks," of which about a hundred and odd will be left for the Aberdeen Show, and a dozen for his house. The breeding stock number about seventy, and about the last of August the young bulls are purchased, and the cows broken, of whose future it seems that we did not say one whit too much this time last year. Charlotte and Pride of Aberdeen have each had a heifer calf.



The bere and barley in Aberdeenshire are generally an average, and the oats below the average; potatoes and turnips were shaping so sadly for rain that the prospects to overstockers were gloomy in the extreme. Turnips seemed unequal, and, if anything, backward. Perth was looking remarkably well in his new Stityton abode; and, as he has no more worlds to conquer, they talk of trying to reduce him, which will be a difficult job. The Perth pets have all knocked about in his sea-voyage from Aberdeen to Newcastle, and his returnticket cost fifteen shillings! The Messrs. Cruickshank have ninety-seven living calves this season from their 120 pure shorthorn cows, and have lost twelve. One season they reached 108. The numbers are, as usual, about the full-sized cows, and the rest are heifers and three. The latter are principally by Lord Raglan, Baronet, and Champion of Benachie, the former sire having been sold at Mr. Cruickshank's this autumn. Lord Zetland's Sir James the Rose (an exchange for the season with Windsor Archer) is also at Aberdeen, and, like Lord Raglan, who has sired 4 he would hardly live to see the two-year-old age has told its tale on this whilom pride of Athelstaneford.

Mr. Hargraves, the celebrated Australian goldfinder, has been visiting his old haunts, commencing with Bendigo, the city of gold in that colony. The South Australian Register of June 25 says:—"Mr. Hargraves returned to Adelaide on Thursday, and has enjoyed the pedestrian trip in the steamer Luira, from Port Lincoln. Mr. Hargraves commenced his great explorations in the year 1850, and his discoveries of gold throughout the country in every direction till he reached Tasmania, taking sections of the geological formation of the various localities passed. He was glad to be found, more or less, throughout this part of the colony; but the chief attraction to him was Encounter Bay, and the country to the west. Yarrow and Onkaparinga, the latter being payable in many places. The same may be said of the country to the north-west of Adelaide. From the neighborhood of Tanunda Mr. Hargraves proceeded northward, keeping as much as possible to the eastern side of the ranges, and extending his explorations to a point 340 miles from Adelaide, to the native Bendigo. Here Mr. Hargraves found Coal Creek and Prairie Blanche after Mr. Hargraves returned through what is known as the middle track, by way of Mount Remarkable, Spencer's Gulf, and Adelaide. From that place Mr. Hargraves proceeded by sea to Port Lincoln, where he again found the country presenting the most favourable appearances for gold. Franklin Harbour, but we believe without success in the way of gold discovery. The country, in fact, from Port Lincoln northward to the Gawler ranges is considerable area of good agricultural land, now occupied only as sheep runs. Mr. Hargraves left Port Lincoln for Streaky Bay, and reached Port Augusta with, in an open cart, a journey which, in the absence of any high nor contiguous mountains, is not a difficult one. Mr. Hargraves has also of very high per centage in more than one locality."

Mr. Hargraves, the Secretary of India lately held a durbar at Simla, to which is invited the Hill chiefs. The durbar was well attended. He Excellency addressed them in a speech which was interpreted to the members of the Council. We give, from the Weekly Patriot, the Viceroy's address to the Hill chiefs, and Thakoors, as they are called in India, and Thakoors,—It is now about fifty years since you were freed from the Gorkha yoke, and placed under British Government. Ever since then you have yourselves been treated, that each one of you, rajah, chief, and Thakoor, retired to your dependants and rests like benefactor of rule and management. Be just to your rests; confine your revenue demands to that which is fair to them. Study their welfare and contentment, and allow no exaction or oppression to have place. Bear in mind, too, the value of knowledge, and encourage education. Without it neither rajah nor rest is secure from error and imposition; knowledge, on the other hand, enables both chiefs and people to comprehend their respective rights and duties, and defends them from being easily duped or misled by the designing and unprincipled. Encourage education, therefore, both in your own families and among your people. I have had much pleasure in receiving you here in Durbar. Before you depart I hope you will see the pretty little house I have of you." Khilauts were then bestowed and otter and pawn distributed.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD RODNEY.

The Right Hon. Sir Robert Bennett Rodney, sixth Baron Rodney, of Rodney Stoke, in the county of Somerset, and a Baronet, was the only son of the Hon. Captain Robert Rodney, R.N., by his wife, Anne, youngest daughter and co-heir of Thomas Bennett, Esq., of Lock Ashurst, Sussex, and was the grandson of George, second Lord Rodney, and the great-grandson of the illustrious first Baron, the late George Brydges Rodney, K.B., Admiral of the Royal Navalists, whose splendid achievements just prior to those of Nelson's time inspired the British Navy, and lal, no doubt, to all the glory that followed. Robert Bennett, sixth Lord Rodney, the subject of this notice, was born May 21, 1820, and was educated at Harrow. He was appointed a Lieutenant in the Scots Fusilier Guards in 1838, but subsequently retired from the Army. He succeeded his uncle, Spencer, fifth Baron Rodney, May 19, 1841. He took out a writ of summons to the local affairs, and for some time past appeared seldom in public, but was ever warmly interested in the welfare of those around him and in the well-being of his care. His loss will be much felt by his tenantry, and particularly by the poorer cottagers on his estate, who have often received kind assistance from him in winter, gladdened by the bounty of his Lordship and his wife. Lord Rodney married, in 3, 1850, Sarah, second daughter of the late John Acquaroni, Esq., by whom (who survives him) he leaves a juvenile family of two sons and a daughter. His Lordship died of consumption, on the 19th inst., at his seat, Berrington, near Leominster, in Herefordshire, and is succeeded by his eldest son, now Sir George Brydges Rodney Bennett Rodney, a minor, born in 1852, who is in his eighth year. This family of Rodney is of very ancient standing in Somersetshire, having possessed property there in the time of Edward the Confessor; but all "the boast of heraldry" sinks into insignificance before those fifty years' active service of the hero who made British naval fame his own, and their wreath, and who loaded the name of Rodney with our naval history for ever.

Dr. Robert Dundas Thomson, a gentleman of considerable note in the scientific world, who died on the 17th inst., at Richmond, Surrey, where he was on a visit to his brother, was born in 1810, and was educated at Glasgow, at which University he eventually took his degree of Doctor of Medicine. After practising some time in London he became connected with many of the metropolitan medical societies, and was appointed Lecturer of Chemistry at St. Thomas's Hospital, having held a similar position in the University of Glasgow. He was one of the founders of the Blenheim Free Dispensary, an institution which conferred incalculable benefits on the poor, and he long acted gratuitously as one of its physicians. He also became physician of the Scottish Hospital, on which his services were equally when most heartily rendered. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, as well as of the London and Edinburgh, the Royal Medical, and the Geological and Chemical Societies, and was President of the British Meteorological Society, and medical officer of health for the extensive parish of Marylebone. Dr. Thomson, in addition to his medical labours, wrote and edited several scientific works. Among them are "Records of Science," "Records of British Annual," and the "Cyclopædia of Chemistry, Mineralogy, and Physiology," besides many contributions to various medical and scientific journals.

MR. JOHN MORTON.

This gentleman, who has just died, at the age of eighty-three, was leading member of the Royal Agricultural Society, and to him is owing the Whitehall model, now there, on the property of the Duke of Devon, whose agent he many years he was. Hundreds of visitors came to this farm to witness the success of his drainage and his vigorous management, and he was the first to illustrate the connection between agriculture and geology. He had a small farm once in Pitlochry, but early in the present century he left his native Scotland and took one of the Earl of Carnarvon's farms at Dunverton, Somersetshire, Through that Carnarvon, he was introduced to the Earl of Devon, and, at the Mr. Posey, of Posey, sold he managed most ably the estates committed to his charge, and he walked through the county with the Duke, who was devoted to geology and farm practice. Among his friends were Sir John Tuer, Sir Philip Egerton, and the late Mr. Pusey, all of whom have on the ground that the farmer is or ought to be one of the largest consumers of brain in the right prosecution of his business. Mr. Morton's well-known work on the Soil has passed through several editions. The opinions in it were written by the late Dr. Buckland and the late Mr. Philip Pusey.

FRANCIS SCULLY, ESQ.

Francis Scully, Esq., who from 1847 to 1857 represented the county of Tipperary in Parliament, and who, during the whole of that period, used to be an ardent advocate of Irish interests, was cousin-german to the present member for the county of Cork, Vincent Scully, Esq., who succeeded him in 1860. He was the fourth son of the late James Scully, Esq., of Tipperary, and nephew of Denis Scully, Esq., the well-known author of "Penal Laws," no little part in their eventual removal. Mr. Francis Scully married, in 1836, Clotilde, daughter of John Simon Morel, Esq., of Grosvenor-square, Hyde Park, and by her leaves two sons. Mr. Scully had been residing for several years past in Paris, in a weak state of health and his death took place there on the 17th inst.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of the Right Hon. Catherine Maunsell, of Wentworth House, Great Malvern, Worcester, was proved in London on the 27th ult., the executors appointed being the Rev. R. H. Maunsell, Lord Annaly, and Sir Richard Davies, Esq., the son-in-law. Her Ladyship married in 1808, and became a widow in 1843. Under the will of her late father, Richard Earl of Listowel, her Ladyship had a power of disposition and appointment over the sum of £7300, which she has apportioned between her sons and daughters, leaving to them also the property she held in her own right. To her daughter, Mary Grace Davies, she bequeaths the mansion and furniture of Wentworth House, and to her eldest son the head-rent and all other interests in and over Ryrey Long Walk, Galway.

The will of the Rev. Sir Thomas C. Miller, Bart., LL.B., late Vicar of Fetcham, Southampton, was proved in London on the 20th inst. personally, the executors appointed being Lady Miller (the relict) and Sir Charles H. Miller, Bart., the son. The testator succeeded to the title of his late Sir Thomas Miller, Bart., M.P., and had been the Vicar of Fetyle since 1826, of which living he was also patron, and died at the age of eighty-three. He succeeded to the baronetcy in 1816, and married, in 1824, Martha, daughter of the Rev. John Holmes, who survives him, and by whom he leaves his heir. He has bequeathed to his relict, beyond her provision under marriage settlement, a further annuity of £200, together with a legacy of £1000. To each of his daughters he leaves a marriage portion or fortune of £4000: and to each of his younger sons £3000, appointing his eldest son, the present Baronet, residuary legatee.

The will of Major-General Richard Hardinge, K.H., formerly residing at Norfolk-crescent, but late of Pyle Hill, Surrey, and who died in London on the 16th inst. by the executors and trustees, Philip O. Papillon, Esq., M.P., the nephew, and Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Hardinge (of the Rifle Brigade) and Captain Edward Hardinge, R.N., the sons of the testator. The personality was sworn under £30,000. The testator was a distinguished officer of the Royal Artillery, and served with distinction in the memorable battle at Waterloo. The will bears date 1860, and there are two codicils appended to the present year. After making several specific and pecuniary bequests to his family, including a sum of £5000 to his son Charles, he leaves his plate, furniture, carriages, &c., he bequeaths to her a life interest over the rest of his property, which upon her decease is to be divided amongst their children.

The public annuity and pension list naturally changes more or less with every year. The pensions on the civil list recently stood for the year ending with March, 1864, introduce for the first time the names of the Prince and Princess of Wales for their respective annuities of £40,000 and £10,000 a year. The other Royal annuities remain the same as before; for the house of Cambridge, £24,000; the Princesses of Prussia, £8000; Duchess of Kent, £4000. The perpetual pensions, of course, remain the same, the heirs of William Pitt succeeding the list with their £4000 a year, to end as long as time and the Treasury shall last. The grant to the Canning family disappears from the list; and so does the retiring pension of Lord Lyndhurst; but there still remain four English ex-Chancellors receiving their £5000 a year; and there are two Irish ex-Chancellors, four English retired Judges, and a Vice-Chancellor. A retired Irish Judge, Mr. Justice Crampton, has place in the list no more; but fate still spares the housemaid of the Irish House of Lords to receive her pension. From the list of retired county court Judges Mr. R. Cooke disappears; but two new names are added, Mr. Serjeant Manning and Mr. W. Walker. The diplomatic pension list has received two new names, Sir J. Hodson and Mr. Christie. The compensation annuities make a long list. Prominent in it by magnitude of amount stands one Poor receiving £1700 a year, as formerly chief clerk of the Court of Queen's Bench: and another £4000 as once registrar of the Irish Chancery; and there is a pensioner with £4028 a year, as formerly Clerk of the Hanaper, and £7342 a year as once Patentee of Bankruptcy.

MATTER OF HONOUR.—No. 9 has come point short it, and shall appear; the rest are much below our standard.

J. B. EVANS (Aberdare).—The key-move to Mr. Wilkinson's Problem, in our notice to correspondents the week before last is—2 to K Kt 4th; if Black, in reply, play 1. P to Q 4th, he then follows 2. P to Q B 3rd, 3. K to Q B 4th, &c. If he play 1. K to K 5th, 2. Q takes K P (ch), 3. Q takes K P (ch), 4. B to B 8th, and mates next move.

SCRUTINIER.—Your Problem is very ingenious, but the solution is too complicated, no longer exists. But, as when the Problem was received does, "Her nahm now cronic another bein," so from this defunct publication another, greater "in admiration" than itself, will arise, and, we hope, soon. The merits of your Problem will not, however, be overlooked, if timely forwarded, as we shall require such, to dedicated solely to Chess, but is intended to take a wider range, and treat on Literature, Science, and Art generally, as well as Chess.

G. S., Fife and Perthshire.—Your Problem is very good, but there is a defence by which the English amateur, M'Donnell, is one played by him.

The Chess Tournament will be solved in due course as it progress. Try it again, and if you cannot succeed, we will give you the solution.

CURRAN.—The "New Code" of Chess Laws is stolen bodily, with the exception of some trifling and unnecessary alterations, from the Code of Laws drawn up by Staunton. It is of no authority in this or any other country. In relation to its crowning monstrosity, the "Touch-and-Move" Law, it is simply a retrograde movement. Under the Old Code, the word Touch, implied necessitating a serious exercise of the field, should become a second King, and that the latter should be compelled to move it. Both words are now obsolete, and the Old Code altered. Absurd as this regulation may seem, it is absolute wisdom compared to the innovation which occasioned it.

rapid charge, which threw some of the corps into disorder. At the close of the review Colonel M'Murdo addressed the officers and men assembled, praising their general appearance and the manner in which the evolutions had been performed. He took occasion, by the way, to announce his own approaching retirement from the office of Inspector-General of Volunteers. We believe that the volunteer corps, all over England, have a high esteem for Colonel M'Murdo. A subscription has been opened, it appears, to make up the loss he lately suffered by the burning of his private house.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 1276.—VOL. XLV. SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1864. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

EXTRA-PARLIAMENTARY UTTERANCES.

WE believe it was the Times which christened speeches delivered by members of the Legislature during the recess "extra-Parliamentary utterances." Whether the name was the happiest that could have been hit upon, it is hardly worth while to discuss. The readers of this Journal need not be reminded that its usual heading for the same class of matter has long been "Members out of Parliament." Either title, however, conveniently enough describes a sort of loose, nebulous, irregular political influence which is growing into more importance every year, which Cabinet Ministers, not excepting Premiers, find it necessary to wield, and which is gradually assuming form as a supplemental political institution. Like most other portions of the machinery by means of which the people of this country ascertain the wants and express the will of that mysterious and invisible potentate, the British public, it has grown up out of occasion. It was never planned. It was not called into being to give additional symmetry or logical consistence to our Constitution. It simply happened at the bidding of necessity. It was found useful. It discharged a function. Political men made it available to political uses. Party leaders, driven to straits, saw how it might be converted into a useful weapon. And now, at last, the unenfranchised, as well as the electors, local magnates, Parliamentary representatives, officials, expectants, the chiefs of her Majesty's Opposition, and the ablest and most conspicuous members of her Majesty's Government look upon "extra-Parliamentary influences" as among the agencies indispensable to successful public life in the United Kingdom.

As we have fairly entered upon the season during which this kind of political mechanism is put in action, and as all recent appearances betoken that it will be vigorously plied this year with a view to the general election due next summer, we shall perhaps render some of our readers a timely service by calling their attention to the part which is usually played in the drama of politics by "extra-Parliamentary utterances." Speaking generally, they answer the purpose of oiling the machinery and preventing too great a generation of heat at its main bearings. Lubrication is their specialty—they do, or may, effect other results more or less useful, but only episodically and by-the-by. But, although lubrication is the primary object of all "extra-Parliamentary utterances," there is considerable variety in the methods of attaining it. The propriety of the process depends, to no trifling extent, upon a strict correspondence between the tone and character of the speech uttered and the position and responsibility of the person by whom it is spoken. On this occasion also has to be taken into account, whether it be festive, social, or purely political in its nature. This being premised, we hope we are not over sanguine in our expectation that the few observations which follow will suffice to impress the minds of our readers with a considerably distinct notion of the manner in which important political ends are achieved by means of "extra-Parliamentary utterances."

Take, for instance, the speeches of Ministers. Time was when Cabinet Ministers deemed it a derogation from the dignity of their office to address any less grave and influential audience than Parliament itself. The First Lord, especially, shunned contact with promiscuous companies, and limited his public appearances, out of Parliament, to the Lord Mayor's feast, at Guildhall, in November. Nowadays, all senseless deference to official etiquette is set aside, and, as a matter of course, the public expect the subordinate members of the Administration to address it once at least during the recess, but looks for a speech or two from each of the Cabinet Ministers. Those high functionaries, therefore, who do not fulfil this expectation, although they cannot be charged in consequence with neglecting the duties of their office, unquestionably leave unused a very delicate, a very penetrating, and a very remunerative element of political influence. It is a natural but, nevertheless, a decided mistake to suppose that an out-of-Session speech from a high officer of State should disclose some important information, or announce some great political principle, or, at any rate, explain and vindicate some leading measure of the Government or course of policy it has thought fit to pursue. All that is best done in Parliament. Out of it Premiers and Secretaries of State are most successful when they can say nothings with most grace, tact, and good humour. Platitudes which nobody will dispute, done up in compact, epigrammatic, and easily remembrable terms, and illustrations drawn from sources most familiar to the audience made lively by appropriate establishment and local colouring, are infinitely preferable in this sphere of activity to profound disquisitions, irresistible arguments, or eloquent oratory. People care a great deal more to see a conspicuous representative of the Government than to hear wisdom from his lips. His position, his character, and especially when it is a cheerful presence, neutralises, as by magic, a large accumulation of political bile, and infuses wondrous spirit into sympathising partisanship. A good joke, a pat allusion, a happy metaphor, a sprinkling of sparkling nonsense, when uttered by a Minister, and especially by a Prime Minister, is a sort of holiday audience during the recess, are like drops of oil in the joints of a creaking engine. They remove the unpleasant effects of political friction, and their influence upon the public temper, and, in some degree, upon the public will, is far more likely to be under than over estimated.

Turn now from Government to the leaders of Opposition. The general effect of their "extra-Parliamentary utterances" is the same, although it is reached by a very different process. It is distasteful, of course, to be grieved and indignant over the palpable misdirection of public affairs; and if they do not show the precise changes by which matters would be mended—about which the most experienced will be as reticent as possible—they must be hypercritical upon what has been done, and signally, but in glowing language, upon what would have been done if they had been on the Treasury bench. Sometimes, indeed, an opportunity presents itself of giving a cue to the policy likely to be pressed upon Parliament next Session with all the vigour and weight of party; but this does not invariably happen, nor when it does is it always made available. The real aim of such speeches, and the practical result which they produce, is to keep the political minority in good heart and humour. They always leave upon the minds of those who listen to them a reverential regard for "our glorious Constitution;" they usually magnify "the wisdom of Parliament;" they dwell more or less eloquently upon the immensity of the country's resources, and they predict with cheerful confidence the speedy rectification, through the influence of their counsels, of what is wrong. The minority hear, applaud, are soothed. Such dissatisfaction as they feel has been fairly and well expressed. Nobody desires that dissatisfaction should ferment into disaffection; nor is there the smallest probability that it will, so long as it is shaken up in the sunlight of political freedom and winnowed by the breath of public discussion.

There are some members of the Legislature—there always have been—whom the public expect to hear betwixt the prorogation of one Session and the commencement of another, simply because they are considered to be worth hearing. Common fame has given them a status before the public. They are known to have a subject upon which they have something to say, or else to say with more savour than most men what they think upon things in general. It would be invidious to name individuals, especially as the class to which they belong is a very limited one. Their reputation is their passport to favour. It is, if we may so say, the property of the country, and the country is proud of it. Their "extra-Parliamentary utterances," no matter on what topic—political, commercial, social, moral, or ecclesiastical—not only command public attention but are believed to repay it. It may be all fancy, but it is a fancy connected with illustrious and memorable antecedents. And so the bare fact that any one of these men thinks it worth his while to address the public at large is persuade the public that it is worth their while to listen. The general effect is satisfaction, not necessarily with what has been said, not always with the manner of saying it, but with the fact that So-and-so has spoken. It soothes the national vanity; it helps to keep John Bull in good humour; it furnishes a genial influence over the irritable excitement of his political temper; in a word, it gives him a sense of gratification in the consciousness that the client does honour to his patron.

The vast majority of "extra-Parliamentary utterances," of course, primarily and directly subserve a local purpose only. They are given in discharge of some customary obligation, or they shed a lustre over some annual gathering, or are an offering in aid of some meritorious institution, or settle accounts between constituents and representatives. But they have a secondary influence, which is rather national than local. They put a garnish of courtesy and good humour about whatever may chance to be, for the passing time, the pièce de résistance of politics. They familiarise Englishmen of all grades with the fact that political differences and political differences can very properly go together; and, for the most part, they take the edge off the acerbities of party.

Such is the not unimportant part which is played by "extra-Parliamentary utterances" in the political life of this nation. We see no reason why anything should be said to notice of "Members out of Parliament," we have ventured to bespeak due favour in their behalf by this introduction. Our readers will see that speeches delivered out of Parliament are to be judged of by far other criteria than those which are properly applied to those delivered in Parliament. We are not, inasmuch as the general purpose they have to answer is to remonstrate kindly feeling and to correct acidities of party temper, we shall hardly err in anticipating that they will henceforth, as formerly, be accepted in an indulgent and conciliatory spirit.

THE ROYAL HORTICULTURAL GARDENS.

FRIDAY week being the birthday of the Prince Consort, the Horticultural Gardens at South Kensington, of which his Royal Highness was the founder, were opened to the public for the first time free of charge, and a vast concourse of people availed themselves of the privilege in the course of the day. The Prince of Wales was one of the scene on our front page. On a recent visit of the Queen to the gardens her Majesty, through Colonel Grey, was pleased to express to the council the gratification she had received from witnessing the improvements then in progress, which she thought when completed would go far towards realising the views of Mr. Loudon, and would conduce much to the success which he anticipated for the society when he inaugurated its establishment in South Audley-street. Her Majesty at the same time intimated that, considering the interest his Royal Highness always took in these gardens, and how much the council owed to his active services and assistance, it would be exceedingly gratifying to her if the council should resolve to confer the honour of naming the gardens after his society as a holiday, and that free admission to the gardens should be allowed for the public. The council, desirous to give the deepest sense of the obligation of the society to the Prince Consort, at once adopted the Queen's suggestion, so that in future, as on this occasion, the money of his Royal Highness will be identified with a popular fête. The council, in signifying the great pleasure they had in giving effect to her Majesty's wishes, felt that regret that they did not see in the hope of assisting in bringing to the mind of the present and future generations the virtues of the Prince and his great services, especially to the working classes, and they assured her Majesty that they would endeavour to offer a hearty welcome to all who might visit the gardens on the occasion. The proceedings were thrown open at ten o'clock; but long before that hour great numbers of persons had assembled at the gates, the early comers reminding one of the crowds that used to besiege the approaches to the Exhibition of 1862 in its earlier days. The gardens continued open until seven in the evening, and it was estimated that not less than 120,000 people visited them in the course of the day. There were three places of entrance. The weather was delightfully fine, and the vast crowd, composed of all classes, but especially of the middle and lower, with a large proportion of children, appeared thoroughly to enjoy themselves and to appreciate her Majesty's condescension. The conservatory, orchid-houses, the arcades, and the maze were all open to the visitors, and the military band of the Marines played during the day. No tickets were issued, and scarcely any restriction was placed upon the visitors. The people a sharp fight the latter was routed, leaving 300 prisoners. In having subsequently been ascertained that heavy reinforcements had reached General Early, and that the Confederates were manœuvring to get in the Federal rear, General Sheridan fell back from Strasburg to Berryville. While the retrograde movement was being executed, Sheridan's rear-guard was overtaken near Winchester by the Confederate advance, under Breckenridge, and suffered severely.

There was a rumour in New York on the 26th that Sheridan had met with a disaster at the hands of the Confederate General, and had been obliged to retreat to Harper's Ferry.

Despatches from Admiral Farragut's fleet confirm the Confederate accounts of the operations at Mobile. The squadron passed Forts Gaines and Morgan under full steam, giving and receiving a terrible fire. The Federal loss during the whole engagement amounted to about 250 men, including the crew of the monitor Tecumseh, which was instantaneously sunk by the explosion of a torpedo. Admiral Buchanan and Admiral Farragut, and the garrison had unconditionally surrendered. Gaines to the Federals, who were preparing to invest Fort Morgan, which they had already begun to shell from two mortar-vessels. The garrison of Fort Morgan made no demonstrations and manifested a determination to hold out to the last. The fort is known to be well garrisoned and provisioned. A body of Federal troops was also said to be advancing from Pensacola in order to attack Mobile. Confederate accounts continue to regard the surrender of Fort Gaines as an act of treachery. The Mobile Register of the 20th ult. states that General Maury has ordered non-combatants to leave that city. The Register says:—"There is no thought of surrendering the city, nor any belief that it can be taken."

Advices from General Sherman's army to the 17th ult. report that the Confederates are vigorously opposing the advance of the Federal communications. On the evening of the 14th ult. General Wheeler, with 1700 cavalry, demolished the entrenchments of Dalton. The Commandant, Colonel Sheldon, whose force amounted to only 800 men, refused to yield the position, and maintained a stout resistance until the following morning, when Federal reinforcements arrived, and the Confederates were driven off. It is reported that a severe engagement occurred at Graysville, eighteen miles from Atlanta, between Wheeler's command and the Federal forces under General Steadman. The result is not stated. General Steadman was severely wounded, and Colonel Straight, of the 51st Indiana, was killed. Colonel Wheeler then had gone to destroy the tunnel at Tunnel Hill. General Sherman was rapidly completing the defences for the bombardment of Atlanta. Hood still maintained a bold front, and there were many indications that a desperate battle was impending. He is known to have received heavy reinforcements.

The Richmond Sentinel states that Chalmers achieved a victory over the Federals at Abberville, Mississippi, on the 14th ult., inflicting on them severe loss.

Hostilities by the Indians in the north-west have been renewed. Many of the settlers in Kansas have been murdered, their houses and crops burned, and their cattle stolen. The inhabitants generally are fleeing to the towns for protection.

Generals Blunt and Blazery, commanding on the border, are organising a large military force to pursue and attack the Indians.

The Peace Democrats had a convention at Syracuse, New York, on the 17th, in which they went in for a peace platform for the presidency, and for an armistice. The telegrams state, but without giving any authority, that a design for a peace meeting ground, the New York Herald urges that commissioners should be sent to Richmond in order to propose an armistice for six months and the convention of a convention from all the States, with a view to the means of obtaining peace. The correspondent of the Daily News writes, however, in a different strain. He states that the feeling in the Northern public was ever one jot more confident of final success, or more determined to persevere, than it is at this moment, and the event of the campaign, though they have had to mourn for many a people hoped for at the outset, have certainly not been such, so far, as to cause any despondency."

On the evening of the 22nd ult. gold was quoted at 256½.

The Confederate cruiser Florida has been taken in a harbour among Federal shipping, having burned more than fifty merchantmen and fishing-vessels off New York and the coast of the Northern States. She arrived recently at Hampton Roads, and was ordered to Newport, by Admiral Hope. The following is her description, published in the New York Herald:—

The privateer Tallahassee is an iron steamer, painted white, with two smokestacks, one abaft the other, about in length, 210; beam, 30; and some nine feet of water. Her hull is marked "Tallahassee, of London, 184—." Engines by J. and W. Dudgeon, London. She has two coal-pits, very rugged, mounts three guns—one small one on the topgallant forecastle, a long 32-pounder amidships, and a 20-under aft. She carries a crew of 120 men. Her crew consists of about 120 persons, including the officers. Men of all nationalities are represented on board, most of them are said to be soldiers from Lee's army. She is said to have run out of Wilmington about six days ago, without having been seen by any Federal fleet or blockaders. She has a quantity of cotton on board to protect her boilers, and there are four thousand bales of cotton on deck to be used in like manner. She is commanded by John Taylor Wood, C.S.N. The surgeon, Shoppardson, says he was one of Mosby's Rangers, and was a Mr. Hall in command. The crew are dressed in rags and tatters. Some of them wear their pistols tied to them with Manilla rope yarn. They are a hard-looking set.

The opening of the fifth Congress of Jurisconsults, at Brunswick, took place a few days ago, when 900 members were present.

The Government of Morocco has decided that widows who pay taxes have a right to vote in municipal elections.

The difficulties which had arisen between Turkey and Montenegro in reference to the frontier have been satisfactorily arranged by a mixed commission.

An Indian telegram states that Sir Charles Trevelyan recommends the introduction of the securities into that country on a large border for coin. The submarine cable in the Persian Gulf is broken.

According to an official document published in Berlin, the value of printed books exported in the seven months ended in July was £218,850, being an increase on the previous year.

A decree promulgating the rural law in the Danubian Principalities has been published. Compulsory labour is abolished. The peasants can become landed proprietors by the payment of a moderate rent to the landowners.

Some communications have passed between the Austrian and Prussian Cabinets upon the expressed desire of the former to enter the German Customs Union. We learn from the Paris journals that M. Lemmens and Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington made a short sojourn in that city on their way from Germany to England, Mdme. Sherrington being engaged for the Norwich and Birmingham festivals. In Paris they were hosts one evening at Rossini's, and on the following day at a private concert given by Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington at the rooms of Messrs. Cavaillé-Coll and Company, the eminent organ-builders, Mdme. Sherrington's fame had not been previously known in Paris to any distinction, achieved a most brilliant success. The leading journals are unanimous in their praises of her beautiful singing, and they mention that the concert was most warm in his expressions of admiration and pleasure. One of the papers—"Meyerbeer had heard of Mdme. Lemmens, and intended to give her a part in one of his works; but this intention was frustrated by his lamented death. It is reported that an engagement for the Théâtre Italien has been offered her by M. Bagier. This would be a great acquisition to the company—"Meyerbeer had heard of Mdme. Lemmens, and intended to give her a part in one of his works; but this intention was frustrated by his lamented death. It is reported that an engagement for the Théâtre Italien has been offered her by M. Bagier. This would be a great acquisition to the company, and the greater because in that case we should also possess the distinguished serpentist, Mdme. Sherrington. We trust that this piece of information is not correct; for Mdme. Sherrington could be as great a loss to our public as she would be a gain to the Parisian; and we have heard, moreover, that she has been engaged, by the new English Opera Association, as the prima donna of the company now in course of being formed, and with which Covent Garden Theatre is about to be opened in October.

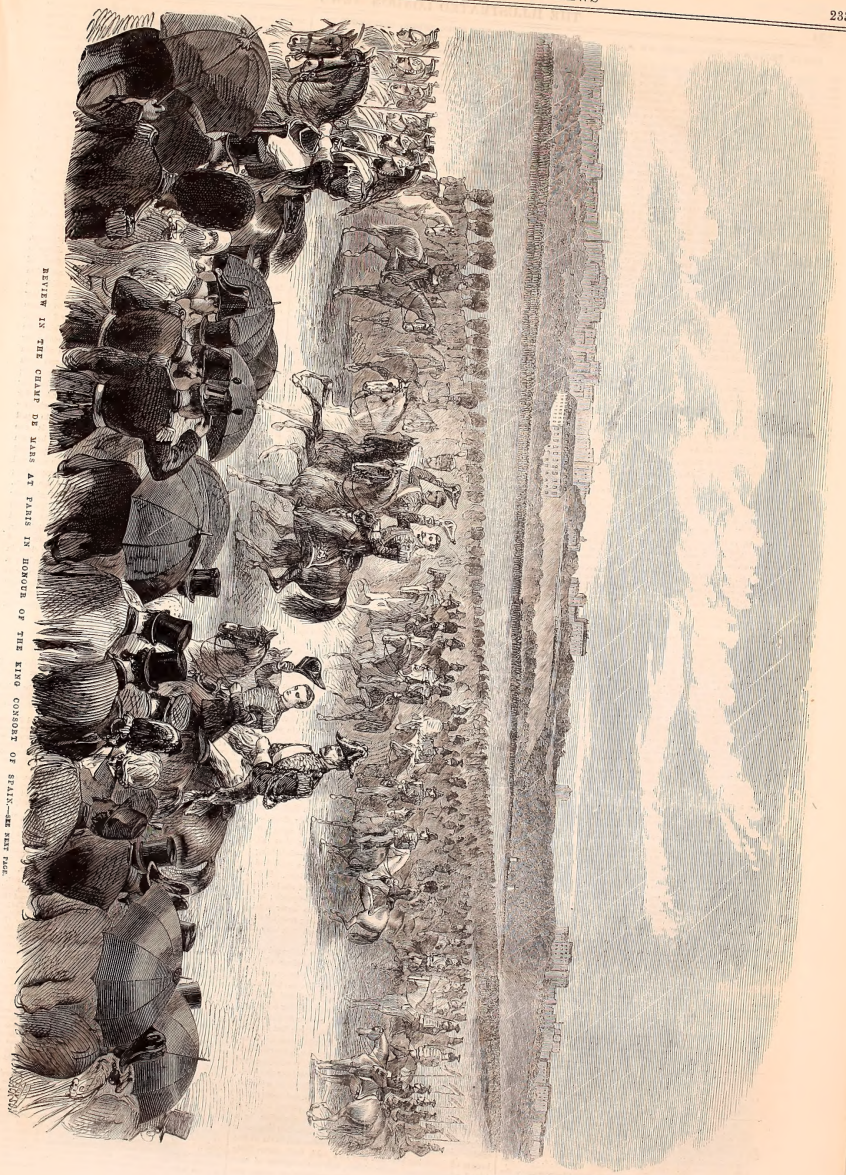
OPENING OF THE AMSTERDAM CRYSTAL PALACE.

The fashion set by England, in 1851, of erecting a Crystal Palace, in which to exhibit the products of art and industry, has of late been so fashionably followed by Holland, a country whose inhabitants, while commercially and industrially among the foremost nations, have been slow in adopting any of the developments of enterprise in foreign lands. An Amsterdam Crystal Palace was commenced in 1858, and if time could be held as the criterion of perfection, this structure would be a model handsome and most finished, as it is the most costly, building of the kind in the world. In this case, what appears to be, is according to the opinion of many competent judges of all nations. The original projectors of the company, whose directors now the Government no thanks whatever for any assistance or facilities it has afforded them. The company's original capital was one million florins, subsequently increased to a million and a half, guilders, or £125,000. From a variety of causes, the directors have had to encounter many difficulties, and consequently an augmenting out their plans; but at length they have overcome their difficulties, and on the 15th of August, 1864, the Crystal Palace was opened under the presidency of the amiable and aged Prince Frederic of the Netherlands, in the presence of about seven thousand spectators. After the preliminary ceremonies and speeches, of which we will only select a few (to the exclusion even of the press) could hear a syllable, Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus" was performed, Meyerbeer's "Marche du Sacre" admirably appropriate for the occasion, were given with glorious effect. In the evening a selection of vocal and instrumental concert in the transept closed the festivities of a day which will long be a memorable one to the citizens of Amsterdam.



The palace is a magnificent development of the Byzantine style of architecture, and was built under the superintendence of M. Rauhenen, the Netherlands Sir Joseph Paxton. Its entire length is 420 ft.; its breadth, 282 ft.; the ground floor is roofed in by a beautiful central window as each end, surmounted by the arms, carved in stone, of Amsterdam, Holland, and the 24 ft. in width. There are three entrances—the grand entrance in front, and one at each end—all of which are approached by broad and lofty flights of steps, from which the accompanying View is taken, is 380 ft. in length; its breadth, 100 ft.; its width, 70 ft.; and its height, 180 ft. It is surrounded by a very handsome gallery projected 20 ft. from the wall, communicating with "the large hall" by eight staircases, and supported by Ionic columns. Above the gallery are handsome bronze crystal doors leading to balconies, from which very extensive view of the surrounding country may be obtained. The large hall, with its double galleries, surmounted by a very poetically conceived figure of Victory, is beautiful light and airy, so much so that it seems as if it were suspended above the building, rather than the forming a portion of it. All round the gallery, at a distance of 20 ft. from each other, are two smaller rows of iron columns, and the dome are two smaller rows—the whole lighting power of the building amounting to 6000 jets. When, on the night of the 15th, they were all lighted, the effect was more than beautiful, it was sublime. From the base of the arched roof were hung "the flags of all nations," which greatly contributed to the effective character of the scene. On each side of the transept are two "additional halls," each 150 ft. in length, 84 ft. in breadth, and 57 ft. in height, which are intended for concert purposes. On the occasion described they were the receptacles of "miniature exhibitions," consisting of very good paintings and articles of furniture, of silver-work and bronze, which excited great interest and admiration. At the eastern end of the transept is the orchestra, affording accommodation for a band of 400 persons. A series of refreshment-rooms, vestibules, and cellars complete the history of a building of which the people of Holland have just cause to be proud. For this special occasion an appropriately ornamented stand was erected opposite the throne for the reception of the Royal president, the directors, and municipal authorities. The greater part of the palace grounds are at present covered with hideous barrack buildings and cattle-pens; but, "fast" as the Dutchmen were, even they could not manage to build their capital in a day; so we may hope that ere long, under the auspicious guarantee of Dutchess, who certainly are not "fast," will one day behold the grounds of their Crystal Palace laid out in a reality as beautifully as they are in the official plans and estimates.

But now that the good citizens of Amsterdam at last have got their palace, "What will they do with it?" is the cry. It certainly a magnificent exhibition building; but Amsterdam is scarcely a city to attract exhibitors, and the Dutch Government, we fear, is too "penny-wise" to encourage them. Horticultural and floricultural shows may do now and then, but they will hardly pay; and for concerts, except when composed of military band music, it is utterly unfit.

We are happy to add that the King of the Netherlands has conferred on Dr. Surphuis, who has been to that undertaking what the good Prince Albert was to the Exhibition of 1851, the Order of the Netherlands Lion, by way of recognition of his meritorious and indefatigable exertions in securing for the capital of Holland this magnificent palace of art and industry.

REVIEW IN THE CHAMP DE MARS AT PARIS IN HONOUR OF THE KING CONSORT OF SPAIN.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

GRAND REVIEW IN THE CHAMP DE MARS, AT PARIS.

WE present a view of the grand military spectacle in the Champ de Mars, at Paris, on Saturday, the 20th ult. It was beheld by an immense crowd of spectators assembled, not only in the immediate neighbourhood, but on the heights of the Trocadero, and on every spot from which the field could be seen. Unfortunately, rain fell slightly a little after the display commenced, and came down heavily before the filing-off had terminated. The troops on the ground consisted of fifty-one battalions of the National Guard, twenty-one of the Imperial Guard, thirty-seven of the line, thirty-six squadrons of cavalry, eighteen batteries of artillery, with 108 guns, the pupils of the School of St. Cyr, a party of the wagon train, and pontooneers of the Grand—forming together an effective force of about 70,000 men. The National Guards and the infantry of the garrison of Paris were drawn up in lines on the left of the ground looking from the Ecole Militaire towards the river, and the cavalry on the opposite side. The artillery were at the end nearest the Pont d'Iena. The troops had taken up their position by half-past two, and at a little before three the Emperor and the King of Spain, both dressed as Generals of the respective services of the two countries, and the Prince Imperial in uniform, on horseback, preceded by a detachment of the Cent Gardes, entered the ground from the bridge, followed by a brilliant Staff, including several foreign officers, and the Spanish Generals Leymery and Joaquin Fitor. Shortly after, in an open carriage, came the Empress, who followed their Majesties along the line of troops, and then, alighting, took her place at the balcony of the Ecole. The Prince Imperial, mounted on his pony, passed along the lines a short distance in advance of the Imperial cortège. Their Majesties and the Prince were greeted with loud cheering along the whole line. In consequence of the rain, which began to grow heavier, the Emperor and the King rather curtailed their passage along the lines, and hastened to join at their station in front of the Ecole Militaire, in order that the troops might march past them. This military movement was effected in admirable regularity, both the National Guard and the troops cheering enthusiastically as they passed. Their Majesties afterwards entered a carriage, and, followed shortly after by that of the Empress and the Prince, returned to St. Cloud.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS,

LONDON: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3.

IT would be ungracious to be hard upon any gentleman who is under the necessity of delivering a speech at a time like this, and it is certainly not for the journalist to be severe upon any other person who is compelled to struggle with the difficulties of a stagnant period. Venium petimusque damusque vicissim. And the French orator, being just now in quite as hard a case as the British speaker or writer, deserves the utmost amount of indulgence. Nevertheless, we cannot help thinking that M. de Persigny has been displaying somewhat less of resources than might have been expected. He took a very large outline, but he has not filled it up with the adroitness we had reason to look for at his hands.

This able and devoted friend of the Empire has thought himself called upon to congratulate the French upon the institutions they enjoy, and to convince them, if possible, that they are in possession of true liberty, while that of other nations, and especially England, would not be worth having. To this process we have not the least right or inclination to object. M. de Persigny may be fairly believed to be sincere in his statements; and he has very good reason indeed for considering that the Imperial régime is excellent. His merits have been by no means overlooked by a man to whom no one can accuse of ingratitude to his friends, and it would be unreasonable to expect that a gratified courtier should not see perfection in a system which puts him in a high social place and covers him with honours. Let him speak of a Government as he finds it. He has served it well, and is ready to serve it again officially, and in the mean time he pronounces its eulogium. His picture of French liberty was intended for French spectators, and we have no more right to criticise it than any public meeting in this country has a right to get clear of a brilliant theatrical scene, which the coloured lights from the wings are bathing in a flood of glory, and to proclaim that the painting is really a daub, and that the rich flood of variegated light is thrown from powder in tin pans held by men hanging by ropes from the roof. Even when we are applauding the skill of the artist who makes so many people happy with such apparently inadequate machinery.

But M. de Persigny, a true artist, knows the value of contrast, and was not content with showing his Frenchmen happy. He must have happy Frenchmen, and must endeavour to increase their self-complacency by assuring them that their neighbours are far worse off. Now, as the average Frenchman is the most ignorant creature in the world upon all subjects outside his own country, we dare say that all M. de Persigny's assertions will be received as undeniable by the cynical Parisians, who know better—have given a good deal of credence to his account of the condition of England. It is out of all probability that many Frenchmen will study the remarks of English writers upon M. de Persigny's speech: but it may be worth while engaging in public controversy what impression a leading French politician, haranguing provincials, has sought to give of our condition, as contrasted with that of the happy subjects of the Elected of the Millions.

The speech, it must be remembered, was not delivered to a mob, or to an assembly like those to which members of the British Parliament will sometimes, out of Session, make speeches which they would not care to embalm in Hansard. The Duke de Persigny spoke to the Council-General for the Department of the Loire, to men who are selected for office by their fellow-citizens, it is said, with much more care than they usually show in choosing political representatives; but as this statement connects itself with certain delicate considerations touching influences, ballot-urns, and supervision, we pretermit further reference to it, and only say that the Duke spoke to a very intelligent and respectable body. He told the people at St. Etienne that the political institutions of England were not adapted to France, for that in England authority and liberty were in the hands of one class. Now, irreverent people say that M. de Persigny is at present completing his education by a study of the history of England; and, if so, this does him much credit, the rather that few Frenchmen condescend to do us the honour of inquiring how and why this cold, dark, damp little island, where the sun never shines, and the majority of men are contemplating suicide because the majority of women are so hideous, has attained the present rank among nations, and asserts that rank successfully when it finds sufficient reason for such assertion. But, it is added, a man cannot do everything at once; and the Duke's reading, careful and accurate so far as it goes, has not yet extended beyond the earlier volumes of Hume, and he was obliged to insert his book-mark somewhere in the account of the days of the Normans, as he had to turn his mind to the preparation of his speech for the banquet at St. Etienne. This allegation may or may not be correct, but there is nothing or discomfit it in his speech.

Authority and liberty are vested in one class in England. It may be so, but the class must be a very large one. Because, unless we are in a fool's paradise, we seem to have reasons for thinking that authority among us springs from the will of the people, and that liberty is enjoyed by every man in his person or a lunatic asylum. But, without entering into the question of English elections, in which cobblers vote, and which decide the relative position of a Palmerston and a Derby, and certainly without hinting at any of the "influences" which surround French elections with that charming atmosphere of Imperialism, might we mention two or three small things not worth naming between friends, but in illustration of the liberty which is confined in England to one class. Dukes may hold political gatherings in St. James's-square, no doubt; but we have some idea that if 10,000 men, without ten hats among them, chose to assemble for a political purpose on Hampstead-heath, it would not occur to the police that the assemblage was violating a law that forbids more than twenty persons to meet, even to debate on the natural history of a new dynasty—not to say dynasty. The aristocracy have their journals; but there is nothing, we believe, and an immense heap of the week's publications by our side confirms the impression, to prevent any person who can get a sream of paper, a few types, and a hand press from publishing anything he likes blaspheny or indecency; and if a farthing journal should be set up to prove that our present monarchy might be advantageously set aside for a dictatorship under a Mormon, we really doubt whether Sir Roundell Palmer would throw the editor into gaol for a breach of censorship law. And there is one other form of liberty which is not altogether beneath notice, and we imagine that we enjoy it here. A paternal Government requires constant information as to the acts and words of its children. We lack a paternal Government; therefore, unfortunately, we dine, and dance, and see plays, and take walks in the parks, and visit our poor, and mind our business, without the comforting belief that a guardian angel in the pay of the paternal Government is watching and listening in the form of the footman, coachman, neighbour, or clerk. We fancy that this kind of liberty, brutal and primitive as it may be, is shared by more than one class in England, and is to be found at a Foresters' fête and in a Freemasons' lodge, just as much as in Stafford House or at Alton Towers. In commending this portion of the speech of M. de Persigny we commend his address to the attention of English readers, who may now feel a decrease in their wonder that "England is not understood on the Continent."

DEPARTURE OF THE QUEEN FOR SCOTLAND.

INAUGURATION OF THE ALBERT MEMORIAL AT PERTH.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, Princess Louisa, Princess Beatrice, Prince Leopold, and the Duke and Duchess of Coburg, left Windsor Castle en route for Balmoral. The suite in attendance consisted of the Marchioness of Ely, the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. Grey, Major-General the Hon. A. Bruce, Colonel the Hon. the Master of Polwarth, M. de Bunsen, Dr. Jenner, Mr. Sahl, and Dr. Jenner. The Queen, with the members of the Royal family, drove from the castle to the Windsor station of the Great Western Railway, where her Majesty was received by several of the directors and officials of the line. A saloon carriage, with composite compartments, special train was provided by the London and North-Western Railway Company, over which line the greater portion of the journey was performed. The Queen left the station at seven o'clock p.m., and travelled over the Great Western Railway to Basingstoke, arriving at eighteen minutes past nine. At this place the Royal family partook of refreshments. The route was resumed at thirty-three minutes past nine, and the Rugeley junction was reached at forty-five minutes past ten. Thence the journey was continued along the London and North-Western Railway to Whitmore, where the engine took in water, and onwards, via Kendal Junction and Carlisle, to Summit station, on the Caledonian Railway, arriving at thirty-eight minutes past five on Tuesday morning.

Thence the train continued its progress to Greenhill, on the Scottish Central line, and arrived at Perth, on the Scottish North-Eastern Railway, at twenty minutes to nine, when the Queen alighted in order to inaugurate the statue erected on the North Inch in memory of the Prince Consort. The railway station was considerably arranged for the reception of the Royal family and suite during her Majesty's stay at Perth. The Lord Queen was received upon her arrival by the Lord Provost, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, and various civic dignitaries, with the directors and officials of the railway. At twenty minutes before ten the Queen and the Royal family, attended by the Lord Provost, the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, M.P., for the city, the numerous civic authorities, and the members of the Memorial Committee, proceeded to the site of the statue. The procession was escorted by a squadron of cavalry, and the route was lined with detachments of Highlanders, &c. On arriving at the North Inch the municipal bodies and other members of the procession took their places within the barrier. A pavilion was erected in front of the statue, to which the Queen was conducted. A distinguished company was also present in the pavilion with the Royal family. The ceremony was brief. Upon the arrival of the Queen the band of the 42nd played one stanza of the National Anthem, but without drums. A short prayer was offered up by the Rev. Mr. Barnton, and the Lord Provost then presented an address to her Majesty. The statue was then uncovered, and the guard of honour presented arms; the band of the 42nd played the National Anthem; the pipes of the Highland regiments sounded a pibroch, and a Royal salute was fired from the top of the Inch. A deafened silence seemed to have prevailed when the Queen, after silently regarding the figure a few minutes, commanded the Lord Provost of the city to kneel, and conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, and he also, now Sir David Wilkie, graciously expressed her satisfaction with the statue and with the proceedings of the day. The Duke of Athole, as Lord Lieutenant of the county, then, kneeling, to the Queen, who expressed to him her appreciation of the statue, both as a work of art and as a faithful likeness of her husband. Her Majesty then returned to the general station. The Queen was received with loud acclamations by the people assembled along the route, which her Majesty graciously acknowledged. A twenty-one minutes' salute on the journey was resumed northwards.

At the Bridge of Dun station, which was reached at eight minutes past twelve, a number of persons had assembled. The Earl of Dalhousie was also present. The Queen conversed with his Lordship for a few minutes, and bowed to the spectators. The train, which was accompanied by the chairman and some of the directors of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway, passed Montrose, Bill station, Aberdeen, at half-past one. The Lord Provost of the city and a large assemblage of ladies and gentlemen were at the station, and heartily cheered the Queen, who graciously acknowledged the salutations. After a few minutes, the train resumed its course along the Deeside line, to the Ballater terminus, which was reached at thirty-six minutes past two. Here the railway journey terminated, after a great run of 569 miles, encompassed in the space between nine and a half, including the journeys by carriage. From Aboyne the route was continued by post to Balmoral, where the Queen arrived at half-past three, and, being the journey very well performed. Prince Leiningen Her Majesty was received with the warmest enthusiasm at the various stations along the route.

The Court is expected to remain at Balmoral for about six weeks, and then to return to Windsor Castle.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

On Tuesday week the Prince and Princess of Wales, with the ladies and gentlemen of the suite, had a picnic on Lochnagar. Although the day was rainy and wet, the party enjoyed themselves. The Prince also visited the Glen of Gelder, where he was successful in bringing down three beautiful stags, one weighing 15st. 4lbs.

On Wednesday week the Prince, Lord Hamilton, and Major Teesdale went grouse-shooting, and returned with fair bags. In the evening the Prince and Princess gave a grand ball at Aberglidie Castle. Among the company present were Colonel H. Farquharson, of Invercauld, and Mrs. Farquharson; Lieutenant Charles Phipps, the Hon. Albert Phipps, and Dr. Robertson; Mr. Berry, of Lochnagar, and a large number of the tenantry on the estates of Balmoral, Abergeldie, and Birkhall. Many of the gentlemen present wore kilts, and the ladies generally appeared in white dresses.

On Thursday week the Prince and Princess were present at a picnic given by the Countess of Fife in honour of their Royal Highnesses at the Falls of Garbet. The Prince and Princess, accompanied by Princess Mary, drove from Abergeldie, on the south side of the River Dee, via Braemar, where a large concourse of visitors was in waiting. The scene at the Falls was most striking after leaving Braemar. The Countess of Fife, accompanied by Lady Anne Duff, the Hon. Miss Ricardo, and Sir Alfred Ker, had prepared for their Royal and other visitors a most excellent music. A walk through the picturesque scenery adjoining the Falls followed, after which the Royal party left for Abergeldie by Invercauld House, delighted with the entertainment.

Yesterday week, having the accommodation of the Royal Yacht at command, the tenantry were invited to meet the Prince of Wales at the obelisk erected by them to the memory of the Prince. Here they were each received with a glass of sparkling wine, and a hearty welcome. In the afternoon his Royal Highness went to Glengelder dcrstalking. Several of the gentlemen had a grand grouse-shooting party. Princess Mary left the Castle en route for London. The Princess accompanied her Royal Highness to Aberdeen.

The Prince and Princess will leave Abergeldie to-day (Saturday) en route for the Continent. Their Royal Highnesses will travel by special train on the Deeside Railway to Ferryhill, Aberdeen, at one o'clock, these continuing their journey to Dundee, where they will arrive at three o'clock, and embark there for Denmark.

PRINCE ALFRED.

Prince Alfred has had great success at salmon-fishing in the waters leased by the Duke of Roxburghe during his stay in Norway. In two days he has killed thirty-seven salmon, which his Royal Highness has returned from the North Cape; and the Racoon, with Prince Alfred and the Duke of Roxburghe on board, is on its way southwards.

Queen Marie Amelie, accompanied by the Duke and Duchess of Montpensier, arrived on Monday at Queen Royal Lodge, arrived at Twickenham Park on Monday from Claremont.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge has left Cambridge House, Twickenham, to pass a few weeks at Claremont.

Their Royal Highnesses the Duke of Cambridge and Princess Mary left town on Wednesday en route for the Continent.

His Excellency the Turkish Ambassador has left the Turkish Embassy for Scotland. Mdme. Musurus and daughters, and Mr. E. Musurus, have left for Paris, en route for Baden-Baden.

The Duke and Duchess of Northumberland left Northumberland House on Saturday last, for York, en route for Alnwick Castle.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Hastings have returned from Scotland to Donnington Park, Leicestershire.

The marriage of Lieutenant-Colonel Burnaby (of the Grenadier Guards), only son of Mr. Burnaby, of Baggrave, Leicestershire, with Miss Dixie, second daughter of the late Sir Wollaston Dixie, Bart., of Bosworth Park, was celebrated on Monday, at St. Paul's Church, Knightsbridge.

A pneumatic railway, about 600 yards in length, has been opened at the Crystal Palace. We shall illustrate it next week.

The Engraving of the Liberty Schooner-Yacht, built on the Clyde, which appeared in our Journal of the 6th of August, was made from a photograph, and painting expressly commissioned by Messrs. Thomas Digby, of Glasgow, for the builders of the vessel, Messrs. Henderson, Coulborn, and Woodward.

The chorale sung at the public opening of the Royal Horticultural Society's Gardens at South Kensington, on the birthday of the late Prince Consort, was given to our readers by request, together with the accommodation of those who would take part in the singing. The music was engraved by his Royal Highness, the words written by Thomas Digby.

The work has been published by Messrs. Addison and Lucas, of Regent-street.

An extraordinary scarcity of fish in the London market for several weeks past has caused much discussion about the sources of supply. Our next Number will contain an illustration of the mode in which they are taken by the fleet of Messrs. Hewett, of Barking, who maintain above sixty vessels along the coast of Holland and elsewhere in the North Sea, to be collected and put on board the carrying vessels which bring them on to Billingsgate. The new proposal, by the substitution of steam-vessels for the fast-sailing cutters hitherto employed in the service, and by an expeditious process of packing in ice, to convey the fish fresh to London from much greater distances and in much less time than has yet been accomplished. We observe that an influential company has been set on foot for this purpose.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

ANYONE who was acquainted with the grumblings about exhaustion which were rife from the lips of our legislators in the last three weeks of the Session must have been surprised to find that many of them, with unusual zeal, presented themselves at once to their constituencies. From a day or two after the prorogation until the end of last week the elected have been performing their annual "lotos" before the electors, and this has been done diligently, if not altogether, by members of mark. The insinuation, therefore, that the spirit which moved them in the previous dilgence was fear of an early general election is baseless, if not base, because such gentlemen as have the opportunity in the previous session to lend a hand to it have all a seat, and are mostly acceptable to their political chiefs, and certain unanimity in consuming the extra-Parliamentary campaign which may be supposed to have proceeded from the unanimity of motive, is curious, and augurs a foregone conclusion in the case of the Ministerial party. Some of these members have, indeed, as their members did, direct from the scene of their labours, with the proroguing Royal Speech still hanging about them, they may have been proportionably acceptable to their constituents, and may not have had a bad notion for them to present themselves before their friends and supporters, and even their opponents, in the rear-guard, unlike, jaded, emaciated condition which, it is presumed, belongs to members at the end of the Session; and which, having no connexion with the results of the co-existent dinners, fêtes, and laborious amusements of the season, constitute a claim to immediate sympathy and future adherence on the part of those who have not themselves undergone or have laboured to the verge of physical destruction.

The first duty of members of Parliament to the public service of the country must have been presented by Mr. White, when he appeared before the electors of Brighton, pale, wasted, tottering, supported between his regular prop-men, and exhibiting the best hope of immediate recovery being in his immersion into that health of Brighton, the sea. Mr. White's case is a typical example, sometimes appropriately speaks, and into which he was about to translate Mr. Roebuck, the Liberals of Northumberland would assuredly when they perhaps found Lord Henley's splendid bass tones dwindled down to a childish treble, or at least hoarse and cracked, with his continuous efforts to be heard amongst the din of local interests! They may have been comforted, however, by finding that Mr. Roebuck, in the enthusiasm of his own constituency for they are not aware that since he last addressed them he has used the organ of speech, in a Parliamentary sense, but once; and that a once somewhat loud platform speech of the prominent speechifier in the Common Council of London has discovered that, as regards the Volunteer Corps, it is not the rank and file of that class of the community which is especially under his charge need no exercise of lungs power, but that his duties will be to be at his post in his office and to vote in the House. It is true that Mr. Gilpin did not take exactly this line in an address which he made to his constituents a little while since, but he did, nevertheless, support the Government, and argued very skilfully a point which may have occurred to the members for Brighton, namely, the great saving of time of his being in the Ministry at all. It is certain that few could have known a Minister of Public Works more than Lord Leigh. Manners when he also came, by no means fresh in one sense, from the labours of Parliament; for, in truth, a more worn and saddened countenance on a public occasion than that of his Lordship at Rugby has not been this while lent. But, mentally and politically, he is still young, and his address, which was delivered with great energy, was a touch of that spirit of debate which used to characterise the speakers of opposeut parties, and which has now nearly passed away, than do.

The "gas," in speaking of the out-of-doors lecturing of members, ought to be taken in a literal sense. Mr. Bright, when he broke the silence which had fallen on members by the breaking of the Parliamentary ice, was in a penultimate stage of "gas" when he emerged from the lobby to Halifax, and there, in the substantial form of a testimonial and the sympathetic greetings of a body of men who get blown off their legs by Parliamentary gas, was in a state of the fullest compensation for the misadventures and the mortifications of speech he had undergone in London.

No doubt on the hustings at Peterborough Mr. Whalley poues blows on the Pope and the Jesuits, unprotected head of the time, with much the same effect and all the energy which was enjoyed by Punch and Prouldbie of Perth when he hacked and hewed at the pate of his wooden Highlander, and Mr. Layard, at Southwark, in the Government is having initiated a movement for the reform of the system of Parliamentary representation, understanding that the best way to do this is a move real triumph than if he had succeeded in disallowing the grant to Maynooth.

But as you know, remember, when they found Lord Stanley taking common-sense and practical wisdom at length by two or three times within less than a month after the Session, that Mr. Charles Buxton man of a Committee on Railway Bills from day to day from the end of March to the end of July in 1845, and in July? Does the public know that a member of Parliament who is confessedly a leading statesman is designated as the future Prime Minister of England, has diligently and voluntarily undertaken the duties of subordinate clerk to a Board, and a Government official into a state which would make him eligible for the Commissionership of Lunacy, and that, while at the same time at the Peerage, his laboured like a galley-slave to settle the vexed question of the arrangement of the metropolitan railways? One can hardly light on a more illustrative instance of the value of a seat than in the work of Parliamentary Committees to some other tribunal than the last that has been mentioned. Parliament is the only place where a physical powers which he needs to lunband for higher labours hereafter, and which, in the present instance, has been carried to destruction such a capacity. It may be added that this is not an exceptional effort on the part of Lord Stanley, but that he regularly performs like this throughout the session as far as it can.

A pessimist per excellence in the matter, Mr. Roebuck seems to have come to the conclusion that Ireland and Scotland in England painted in such colours? Happiness was spread out, and this and firms, but thick, stout, and adapted for wear over the whole land. Nowhere in Europe was the community's wealth abundant and so widely distributed that such a thing as a dearth of employment was not unknown. Our philosophers and writers of newspaper paragraphs; security so perfect that every man might travel from Dennaby to John o' Groat's without carrying a person and property—just as Mr. Briggs did from Bow to Rochdale all the Powers of the world bowing down before the might of Britain; nobody dreaming of attacking us, and we of attacking nobody. In short, a Cotters Foust—given, it is to be presumed, to show that all the Radical visions are not rent from the town, but are used to the best advantage there—might be taken as the type of the condition of the country. A sort of Eden, in which the serpent was the only discord, or has not been prevented, by the adoption of a policy exactly the reverse of that which Mr. Roebuck would have pursued if he had had the power, by which he is assisted to keep down by him those honourable and arbitrarious gentleman taking up the art of Parliamentary speaking, but his powers are not sufficient to behold.

Perhaps the lecture, in partibus, which has been most commented upon, because it was the most elaborate, was that of Sir John Trelawny. In his manner in Parliament Sir John is so subdued, his tones are so monotonous, and his whole appearance has such a depressing air, that he is enabled to slip out strong opinions, sharp criticisms, and illustrations of the most extraordinary kind by means of giving offence as any man could hope for. Physically, he appeals to forbearance—for he seems fragile and premature aged—and he causes the observer to feel that the mental personality that one would so soon think of knocking him down as retorting severely upon him. He possesses, too, great tenacity of purpose, while his scent (not to use the word offensively) for a grievance is at once searching and unerring. With all this, he combines tact and knowledge of Parliamentary things, which have availed essentially in his treatment of the church-rate question, and his latest act in that respect—namely, the withdrawal of all mention of the subject this year, is an evidence of these qualities. It is not possible here to enter into any dissertation of his recent speech, but it may be asserted that a consideration of that address will justify the sketch of his characteristics which we have set down.

Those who in the very, very last days of the Session saw and heard Colonel Wilson Patten battling for his measure for the reform of the private business of the House know that he has no need to come in missericordiam before his constituents if they can appreciate one of the most earnest and indefatigable members of Parliament that ever lived. His influence is felt in a way which no one out of, and perhaps but few in, the House can understand or appreciate. Although now a grandfather, Colonel Wilson Patten seems to have lost none of that energy which belongs to a temperament eminently sanguine, using the word in its technical sense; while in personal appearance he seems to be one of the youngest men in the House. In a meeting of the electors of South Lancashire he was supported by his colleague, the Marquis of Hartington, whose character of merit as a local member has already been acceptable to a constituency which sees the man of its choice taking such a position as that which the Under-Secretary for War has assumed. Standing, as the Secretary of a department which is subjected incessantly to guerilla attacks—the most difficult of all to meet—he has met them with unvarying success, and although he exhibited an aptitude for ready reply which is surprising, and which one can only attribute to his birth, Lord Palmerston displayed when, at an age cognate with that of Lord Hartington, he managed the War Department in the House of Commons. What if the similitude be carried out completely, and a Lord Hartington be before the young official and growing statesman of to-day as that which has been the fortune of Lord Palmerston in 1809?

A brief paragraph in a newspaper informs the world that Mr. Whitfield has been pronouncing for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel at Huntingdon and Bedford. As the Soldiers' Friend he shall hear a French official had shot himself in his "bureau"—a bureau a "wardrobe" only—"Great Powers! how gal ize them!"

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

The Colosseum is about to be pulled down. The necessary auction from the Crown has been obtained for the alterations, and it is intended to build on the site a structure on the Regent's Park plan, but a panchinion, or warehouse for storing goods, on the Albany-street side.

The members of the various choirs in the metropolis, under the conductorship of Mr. Leslie, of Finsbury, were brought together in the Crystal Palace on Wednesday. Upwards of 3000 choristers occupied the transept orchestra, and performed a selection of pieces, sacred and secular. Notwithstanding the morning was very wet, more than 21,000 persons entered the palace.

The British Museum, which was closed to the public on Thursday, will be re-opened on Monday, the 12th inst.—the alterations being Saturdays, Wednesdays, and Fridays—the Saturday afternoon admission of sixpence to be the present rate. The reading-room in May last, when and reading-room will be reopened on the 8th inst. During the recess, the Farmer Collection of tracts purchased from Mr. Farmer for £4000, will, it is expected, be added to the gallery of sculptural antiquities.

On Saturday last a fete was given on the grounds of the Welsh and Cheshire Dairy Company, Hatch, by the directors, to celebrate his presentation to the asylum of £1000 for the erection of additional buildings for the sick poor. Lords, members, and gentlemen, and directors of the almshouses, sat down to a sumptuous entertainment, provided at the cost of Mr. Rowlands, the chairman of the company, and subsequently to which the whole proceedings passed off in the most agreeable manner.

The highest affectionate curiosity was excited in the vicinity of the Bank of England by the arrival of a long train of railway vans belonging to the South-Western Railway Company, and with two cartons containing several tons of gold and silver, bullion, and specie, which had just arrived from the mint at Southampton, by means of the railway. Such was the quantity that it took nearly the entire afternoon to unload the vans and deposit the ores in the vaults of the Bank, the total value of the treasure being 7,345,112 dollars.

The Chamberlain's accounts with the Corporation of London in respect of the City Police Force, from the 30th day of June to the 31st of December, 1863, were issued on Monday. The revenue for the year amounted to £178,121, and the expenditure to £178,121, leaving a balance of £1,121. Among the items of expenditure are expenses of the reception of her Royal Highness the Princess Alexandra, amounting to £1,000, or the sum of the amount of the present of the Corporation to her Royal Highness, £10,000; expenses of entertaining the Prince and Royal Highness and Princess of Wales, £16,000 2s. 8d. The sum of £257,619 has been transferred to a reserve fund, leaving a balance in the hands of the Chamberlain, on the account of the Corporation of £13,282 12s. 8d.

The Metropolitan Police Act was passed to enable the City to form a viaduct or raises may across the Holborn valley, and for that purpose to borrow money on the credit of the consolidated rate, and to repay it by a certain period of ten years, for the purpose of providing means to defray the cost of the undertaking. Considering the alterations in and adjacent to Holborn-hill and Skinner-street. The duties were continued until 1852, and are now further continued until the 1st of August, 1865, at the rate of a sum of £d. to be taken towards paying the interest on the money obtained on the credit of the consolidated rate for the purpose of this work. Thus have been deposited of the intended viaduct and other improvements on both sides of Holborn-hill. The works are to be completed in five years.

Last week the births of 1915 children—992 boys and 923 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1854-63 the average number registered was 1841,—the mortality of London has shown no great fluctuation in the last three weeks. The number of deaths registered in the week ended last Saturday was 1,176. The average number of deaths in the thirty-fourth week of ten previous years, 1854-63, was 1,109, so that the increase of mortality in the last week was returned in 190 cases in the week, the number in the previous week having been 1,176. The deaths registered in the week from accidents in the A.D. 49, Hanover-street, Hanover-square, a widow died, whose age, as recorded in the register, was one hundred and one years and seven months and three days.

A meeting of the Royal National Life-boat Institution was held on Tuesday evening, at the house, Adelphi—Captain Sir Edward Perrott, Bart., V.P., in the chair. Rewards amounting to £92 were voted to the crews of the lifeboats stationed at Southport, Lytham, Blackpool, Hastings, Brighton, Caistor, and Arklow, for going off to vessels in reply to signals of distress in heavy weather, by which they had been saved by their means before the arrival of the life-boats. It was reported that the life-boats had on every occasion done very well, and that the crews had behaved well, and a copy of its vote on parliament were voted to Miss Le Geyt, a resident of Sark, for her humane exertions in rescuing persons confined in rescuing two ladies from drowning at Lyme Regis, on the 4th ult. Miss Le Geyt rowed out to the assistance of the two ladies, who had been carried out to sea by the tide, and succeeded in saving them both. Various rewards were also granted to the crews of the life-boats stationed at the following different weeks on the coasts of the United Kingdom. Payments amounting to more than £1000 were made on life-boat establishments during the month, and 14 new life-boats to be built on various parts of the coast. The committee decided to station a new life-boat at Port Isaac, near Great Yarmouth, in the room of the present old station, which had become nearly unfit for service. That boat had, during the past twenty years, been the means of saving a number of persons in the outlying sandbanks in the locality. The institution had, during the past month, granted the sum of £50 to the widow of Cudgian, and £10 to Charles, The French Government had instructed Capitaine de Vaisseau De la Roche Kerandraon, of the Imperial Navy, to visit the principal stations and its life-boat stations, with the view of making himself acquainted with the mode of management and working of the system of the United Kingdom. Mr. Forrest are now building three life-boats for the French Government, under the superintendence of Mr. Lewis.

LAW AND POLICE.—Miles Ellison, the man who was charged, both with robbing and shooting the gamekeeper of Royal Engineers to her Majesty's service and to go into the Federal army, was again brought before the magistrates at Westminster on Monday, when the case of more robbery were taken, but the charge of inciting to actual desertion was not made out. Mr. Arnold, in discharging the prisoner, remarked on the case of the discipline observed in the barracks which admitted of a civilian passing the night there. The prisoner was then remanded until that day week.

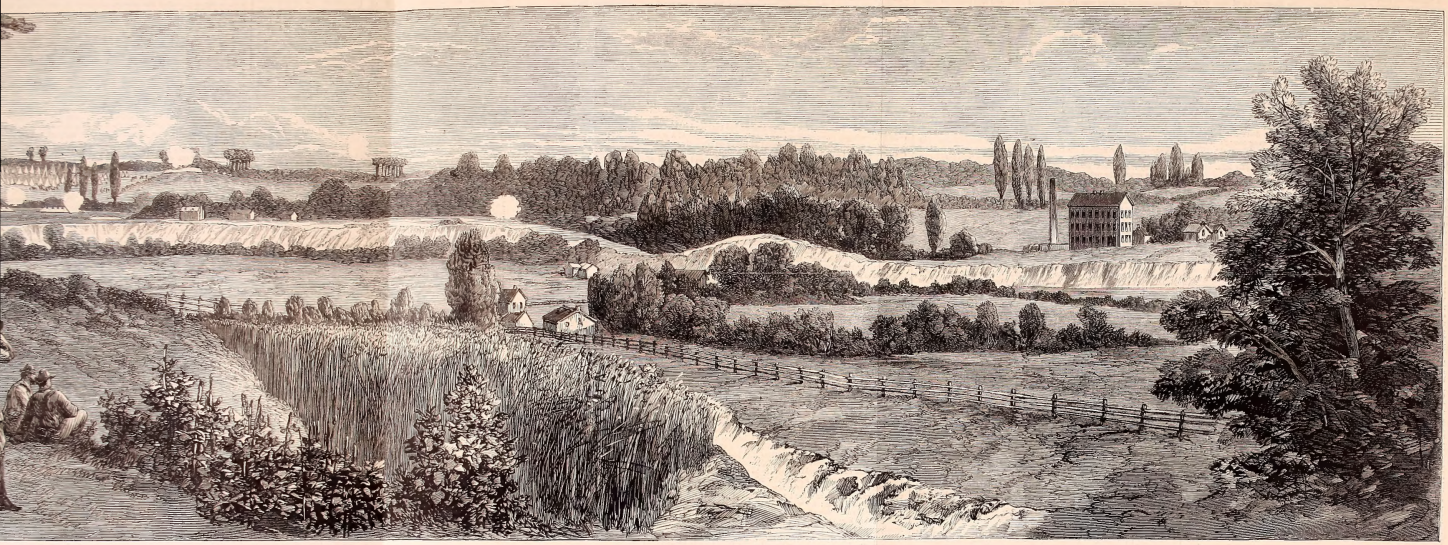
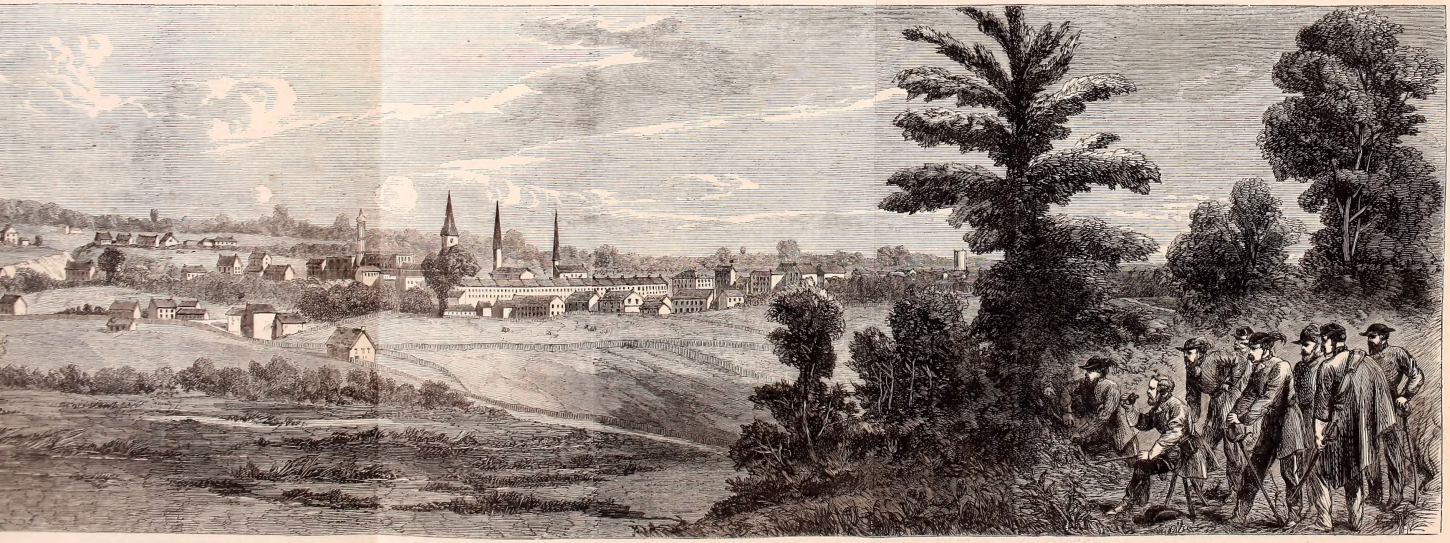
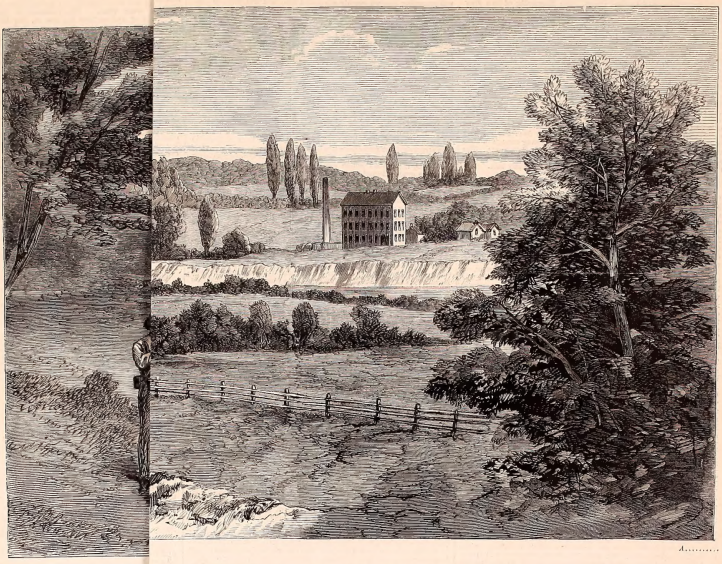
A man named James Buckingham lived at Mile-end New Town with his wife and his wife's sister, Mary Ann Smith. They were seen one day by the neighbours, on Saturday last, broke in the doors and found the two women dead and the man in bed. He was taken to the hospital without injury but in a state of idiotcy. The sister was kneeling with her face buried in her hands, and there were no signs of violence upon her body. The wife was in bed, three upturned to have been a struggle. Buckingham had exhibited symptoms of insanity for some time past. An inquest on the bodies of the two sisters was opened on Monday. James Buckingham was examined, but his answers betrayed such mental imbecility that nothing could be gathered from him except the one point that the women had not come by their death through him. The other evidence showed that the unfortunate victims had drunk themselves into as imbecile a state as the husband, and given up eating altogether for the sake of liquor. The coroners have been committed to a lunatic asylum, with a view to the detection of poison.



A reptile has been granted by Sir George Grey in the case of the convict Mary Hartley, who was left for execution at the last Session of the Central Criminal Court, having been convicted of the murder of her child, which she stuffed up a chimney in a public-house in Gray's-inn-lane.



THE WAR IN AMERICA.



VIEW OF PETERSBURG AND ITS SUBURBS FROM GENERAL LEE'S HEAD-QUARTERS.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

VIEW OF PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, FROM GENERAL LEE'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

OUR Special Artist in the camp of General Lee has sent us his sketch of a panoramic view of the town of Petersburg and adjacent country, including the camp of General Grant. The Engraving of this view extends twice across two pages of our Paper, the lower half being intended to join the upper half, and to end. We gave some account of the town of Petersburg with our View of that place which was published a fortnight ago. In our present Illustration, though it has been impossible to show the lines of the two contending armies, their relative positions can partly be made out by starting from the tents of the Federal soldiery, which are shown very distinctly, and which are seen left of the upper half of our Engraving, and following from left to right the indications of earthworks and rifle-pits until they are overlooked by the foliage of the wood. At the extreme right-hand corner of the second portion of the view we come upon General Lee, with his staff officers, partly sheltered behind a screen of trees, and watching the enemy's movements through a field-glass. Our Correspondent, writing on the 16th of July, says that the ground from the Federal earthworks had been entirely deserted upon the women and children, who still remained in the town, and that it had not done the slightest injury to the Confederate troops, who were in the trenches and in the trenches beyond the belt of wood which surrounds Petersburg. The men of the advanced posts on both sides were constantly in leave of shooting at each other, come forward, and have a friendly talk.

THE FARM.

SCOTLAND is full to repletion with sportsmen and tourists, and the latter are lying on sofas and accepting shakedowns under dining-room tables with a grim endurance which does them infinite honour. The energy with which they "do the scenery" is perfectly amazing to those matter-of-fact gleaners who can see no beauty in a "heather hill" except Cheviot or blackface wethers are browsing on its sides or skyline, and who care very little for a glen or a pass unless a herd of West Highlanders are feeding in it. We find the harvest pretty general all over the country, and "wheat and barley fair and oats right" seems to be the usual verdict. Turnips are looking best on the whole, than we expected, but in many parts the drought has brought them to a dead check. We noticed a great robust mangel-wurzel walking about the Lothians on a tuft of turnip with an umbrella, not, as he said, to save his complexion, but "just to encourage the crop." In the Vale of Southesk the crops are much better in the field than that of last year, which was quite an extra crop as regards quality and quantity; and in the Lothians they are a little above the average. The frosty nights in some places have blackened the haulms and left strong traces on the fir-cones.

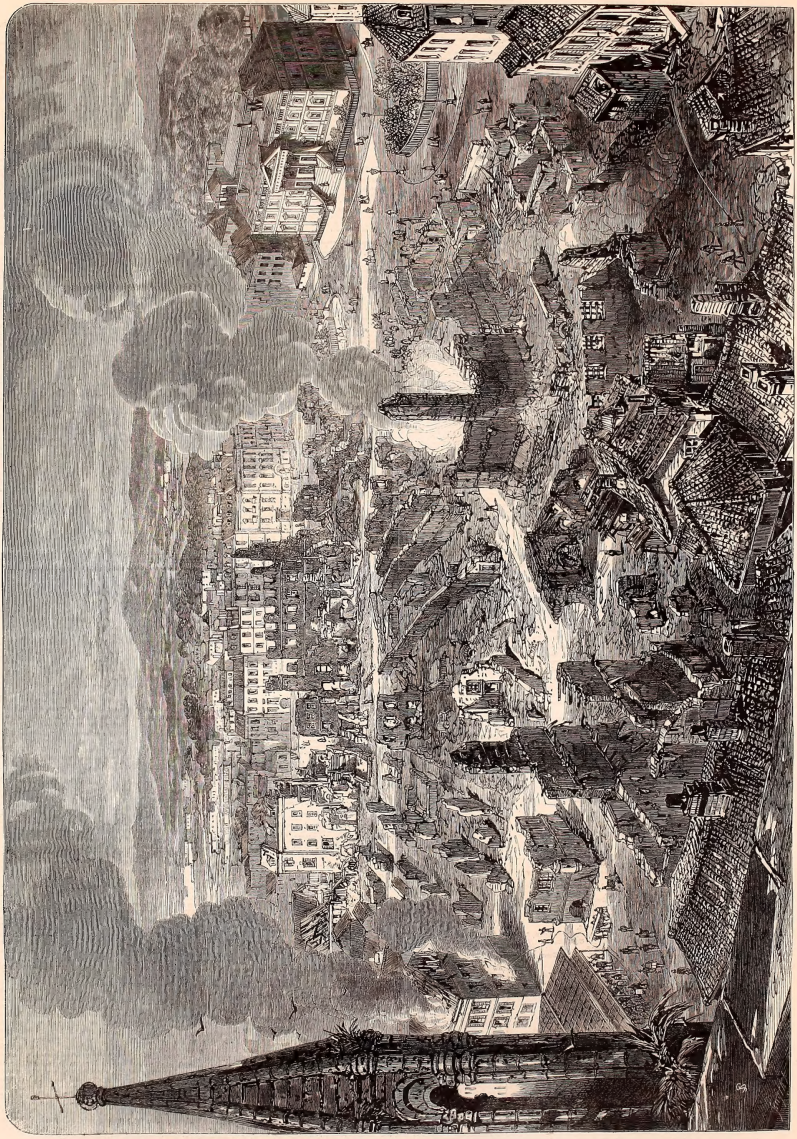
There are not many herd names, Scotch or English, floating about. The well-known red prize bull, Mr. Balfour's Great Seal, weighed, we are told, 216 imperial stone. Five animals, the property of the late butcher's hands at Newcastle, Her Grace the Dowager Duchess of Athole has upwards of 100 Ayrshires in her herd, at Dunkeld, and Colby Hill, despite her advancing years, looks as fresh as when she was at Battersea, and at present stands second, out of nearly fifty, on the milking list. One of her bull-calves is not much like Mr. Bell's another, much more the colour of herself, arrived not so long since. His Grace keeps up the Polled Shorthorns, and has a fine lot of them at Blair Athol; and his quartet of four-year-old bullocks, which have won at Stirling, Kelso, and Perth, are, we believe, intended for the Birmingham and Islington shows, at which Scotland seems to be meditating a very dashing foray. The Beaches Park herd has been reinforced by some Ravensyre cows, several of them are roan heifers from White Lady, Joan of Arc, and Sweet Mary, and two of them by Mr. Bell's Shorthorn bull Grand Duke. The first and the last have been called "Queene of Rosalea" and "Victoria Rosa." The 500-guinea Victoria has not proved such a first-rate prize-taker all as she promised to be when a calf, but she had two heifers when she was three years and a half old), Prince Victor, who was sold for 2000 guineas as a bull calf, and Lady Ida, which unfortunately died. Her Ladyship has a sale on the 20th of September of twenty-six shorthorns and twenty-five roan lambs, at Pure Lincolns, besides pigs and other stock, including two or three Kerrymoor calves. Mr. Douglas's Pride, Princess and Queen of Athelstane, Florals, and two Duchesses of Gloster have been packed from Liverpool to Canada last week. They were accompanied by their new owner, Mr. Bell, Warlaby, and Mr. James Thompson, their old herdsman. And so ends the far-famed Athelstaneford herd, which proved that it was possible for an East Lothian tenant-farmer, with nothing but his own industry to aid, to create a herd which should successively give battle to the crack English breeders with long purses and still longer pedigrees on their sheets. The bold front which was shown by his countrymen in the shorthorn classes at Newcastle is another proof that the spirit only required stirring; and it was pleasant to hear that the original champion once more in that first place with "The Pride," which he had held against Booth and Torr during a hard run through Yorks, with Rose of Summer, Second Queen of Trumps, and Rose of Athelstane. Mr. Christie has a lively lot of young stock on hand, and hopes to hold a regular sale of bull-calves every year. We shall be curious to note how the Canada judges place The Pride and The Queen if they come into the same class. The latter is now in calf to rather inclines to the former.

The Stubble rules are falling fast and thick this autumn. Thursday and Friday next will witness the opening of the second '64 campaign with a dozen of the Duke of Devonshire's at Holker. The Southwicke sale stands for the 6th of October, and there are divers others on the list. The Shorthorn has changed hands many, and has no room; another is leaving his farm; the executors are selling up, and so on. In the cause what it may, I believe our chasers to look out very sharply after the "repurchase" system, which is becoming so fashionable, and which, unless it is promptly suppressed, will gradually nullify the "without reserve" clause in the conditions. Mr. Higden's Southdown sale and letting went off pretty well, the highest price being 36 gs. for a ram, and 15 gs. for a ewe and lamb. The Edinburgh trip sale list is a promising one, considering it is only the second year, and that it comprehends Cheviots, blackfaces, and half-breds, as well as Leicesters. Mr. Kelso takes the chair on next Friday reaches 2300.

Several of the leading men will sell their Lincolns at the New Run Fair at Peterborough on Saturday next; and on Friday, the 16th, Mr. Cockburn's twenty-five will come to the hammer at Ingoldmells. Mr. Jonathan Peel's magnificent lonk ram Mountain King has gone at last the way of all mutton, and his head will form no mean trophy at Kinchmere Manor.

The half-yearly meeting of the Boston and Sleaford Railway Company was held on Tuesday at the Euston Hotel—Mr. T. Perry in the chair. The report stated that the receipts for the half-year amounted to £17,776, being £1,000 more than that of the corresponding period of 1863 by £1778. The bill promoted by the Great Northern Company in the last Session, authorizing a lease to them of this undertaking, on the terms that this company should receive in respect to their share capital of £200,000 preference stock, a dividend of seven per cent, Northern Company, bearing dividend at the rate of £4 5s. per cent per annum in perpetuity, to commence from the 1st of July, 1864, and payable to the said the proprietors in this company would accordingly be entitled to exchange their share certificates. The directors recommended a dividend at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, being 1 per cent more than the dividend of 1863. The chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said that the position of the company was now almost brought to a close. Before dissolving, however, there would be a meeting held in November to wind up the affairs of the company. He thought that the balance that would remain in hand after liquidating all claims would yield about 10 shillings per share, or, as the Scotch accountants, 10 per cent. The dividend was then declared, and a vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

Many extensive improvements have already been effected under the Public Works Act at Preston. On Saturday a special meeting of the Town Council of the borough was held in order to pass under the common seal of the Corporation mortgages to the secretary of the Public Works Loan Commissioners for the sum of £15,000. Some time ago the Council obtained authority from the commissioners to borrow £20,000. Of this sum £10,000 has been spent in different improvements connected with the property of the Corporation, and of the £15,000 passed under the seal on Saturday £10,000 will have to be expended in a similar manner. £5000 has been expended in private improvements, and the £2000 beyond the £10,000 named will be forthwith appropriated to further improvements in this direction. The public improvements at Preston include the enclosure of the park, the laying out of several streets, and laying out ornamental grounds on the Moor at Avenham.



ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

THE suggestion that a Royal Consort—naturally Prince Alfred—should represent his mother in Dublin Castle, and gratify the loyal Irish with his presence, has found much favour in Ireland. Our readers will remember that we warmly advocated this, and will perceive that (in our opinion) a thorough ventilation of the subject must result in having good and lasting fruit in carrying the point. Irishmen long and deeply in not fairly treated by Royalty. For many weeks in each year the Queen resides, and has resided, in Scotland; Prince Albert elected himself in the gift of old Grad," and won his spurs in Caledonian and gentry by his prowess at deerstalking. "In the train of her Majesty," as the Court Circular has it, "followed the usual essential blessings." There is no doubt of this. The most substantial of them all is, however, the loyalty and contentment of the people; the feeling that the Queen is not only of England, but of Scotland too, and that both north and south of the Tweed she is "at home." Ireland, on the other hand, is recovering his health at Castle Howard, and the viceroyalty is, as it were, in abeyance. Her Majesty Queen Victoria has been very kind, gracious, and, of course, wise, consideration the question, whether both the Royal family and our troublesome sister Ireland would not be the gainers by sending a princely representative. It is true that the Ministry would not suffer from loss of patronage, two noblemen having refused the office; and that the frequent cases of loss and insolvency treated by the Court which are put forward by the Irish papers would be gracefully put an end to.

It is a most curious thing to observe when the butt of the club or the tool of the village gets the better of the wiser men, and carries his point. It is always to be learnt at hustings or at the bar, and by those playing you have laughed at and whose skill you have pooh-poohed. Such, however, is the position of England in regard to the Danish Succession. Her Majesty Queen Victoria never will allow Herr Rockun Dolffs and his hat, and that Herr von Bismarck cane in for the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein. Alas! now it is Bismarck's turn. He is not only "one of the most important men, Sir," but he actually is at this time the most powerful man in Europe. He has his way, he whisked here and there by railways, built chiefly with English money, to meet Baron von Schenck, or to be attended by Lieutenant-General Count von Moltke, or to be sent to Carlsbad to drink the waters with whose playing you have laughed at and whose skill you have poohpo

NATIONAL SPORTS.

ALTHOUGH, to borrow a commercial phrase, there has been a glut of racing in the turf market this week, there was not even one meeting that commanded a large attendance or the enthusiasm of the few who did participate in the sport spread, as it were, all over England. The Stockton Meeting was shorn of the interest anticipated by the non-appearance of Miner in the Stockton Tradesmen's Handicap. It can hardly be imputed to this loss that the Derby extra weight he would have to carry for winning the Great Yorkshire Stakes detered him from swelling the conquest of Black Maid to Stockton; but it may fairly be presumed that he considered it better policy not to bespatter his Leger chance. Lord Zetland's Revival was also fain to defeat the field of eight opposed to him, his success eliciting a hearty round of cheers for "the sport," always so popular in Yorkshire. The Heven and Exeter Meeting, at Heddon, was simply an "outing" for the few members of the ring who were present; the inhabitants of the dull old-fashioned town, as well as the rural population, seemed to enjoy the sport vastly. To Lord Portsmouth it is chiefly owing that the meeting was revived at all; and the youthful Lord Courtenay, now one of the representatives of Exeter in Parliament, takes especial delight in winning fresh honours among his young constituency by promoting the sport in which he delights. The principal event on the programme—the Great Devonshire Produce Stakes—fell to Sultaness, bred and owned by Lord Portsmouth himself, his success being hailed with satisfaction by all and every. The metropolitan division of racing men patronised the Tunbridge Wells meeting, which also opened on Tuesday, and, though no match of rare run, the fields were large and speculation rife. On the same day Culler On met her speedy overthrow at Guestling, without accident by some private individuals who did not hesitate to expose their lives, happily with success, for the general welfare.

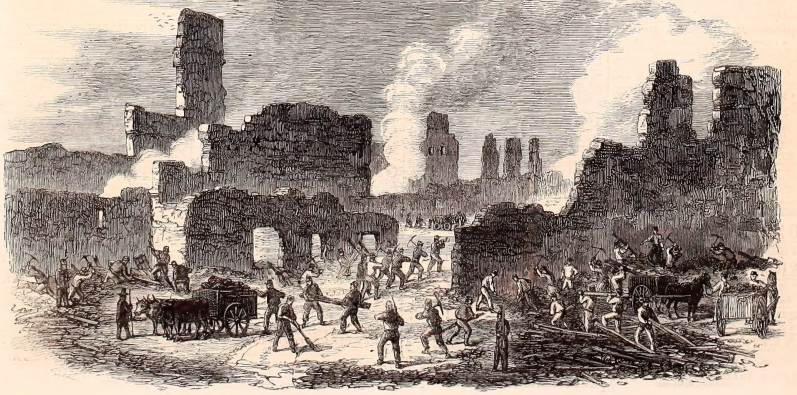
THE GREAT FIRE AT LIMOGES.

FROM SKETCHES BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST.



THE PUBLIC CRIER ANNOUNCING THE DISTRIBUTION OF RELIEF.

As soon as the Emperor became acquainted with the calamity at Limoges, his Majesty, with his usual promptitude of action in such emergencies, immediately sent one of his aides-de-camp, the Count Reille, to the scene of devastation, with full powers to act on the Imperial behalf. Material aid was at once afforded to the poor people suddenly become houseless, and the public crier was sent forth to announce that assistance and refuge were open to all the victims of the conflagration. (This episode forms the subject of one of our Engravings.) The example given by the Emperor—who, together with the Empress, the Imperial Prince, and the King of Spain, immediately subscribed a large sum of money for the sufferers—has been cordially followed by all classes of French society. All the French newspapers have taken the matter in hand, and do not appeal in vain for subscriptions, which are pouring in to such an extent that the pecuniary loss will in all probability be partly covered, with the double advantage that the indigent persons who had lost their all will have new furniture in the place of old, and that the space cleared by fire will soon be converted into a new quarter, more in keeping with the modern ideas of elegance and sanitary requirements. "Out of evil cometh forth good" may therefore be truly said of the great fire at Limoges, which nevertheless has produced a profound sensation throughout Europe, from the extent of its ravages and from the immense dangers to which, at its outbreak, the lives as well as the properties of a worthy industrial population were exposed.

As a dessin d'ordre, our Artist, who remained six days at Limoges, sketched the third subject of our Illustrations—the firemen and soldiers of the garrison clearing out a portion of the ruin. No praise is too considerable in estimating the labours of these noble firemen-soldiers, who are ever ready and willing to risk their lives to save a fellow-creature or to ensure the public security.

A collection was made at all the Paris churches on Sunday for the burnt-out families of Limoges. The Emperor has authorised a lottery, with a capital of 5,000,000f., for the same charitable purpose.

MR. TENNYSON'S NEW POEMS.*

We should not have ventured, a priori, that a great success in the book-market was any certain proof of the merits of a book of poetry. The shillings of the million constitute a public before which we have even the inglorious prosperity of many flashy books, and some of rare merit with readers fit though few. Works of imagination and humour, indeed, when they achieve a vast and rapid sale, are likely to be works of genius; but they may be very inferior works of art. Not seldom, to be sure, are those of our Poet Laureate, who, as a careful artist, with a fine hand directed by a fine eye, design, correctness and grace of form. It is, then, by the more exquisite virtues that he has won such an immense popularity in an age when the chaste or pure in an art were known by any popularity for people? This is rather an important question; for the Art of Poetry, by their servant Mr. Tennyson, will not, even on a decisive victory and recovered her old dominion, if the sale of twenty thousand copies is a fortune may be ascribed to the excellence of "Enoch Arden" properly as a poem.

But what is the excellence of a poem, and what the essential art of poetry? We are not going to enter upon the discussion of the first; poetry combines in her own operation those of all her sister arts—building, sculpture, painting, and making music with the elements of Thought and Language. Harmony, indeed, is the soul of all these arts; but poetry combines in one compass a double harmony—the outward and audible harmony of syllables, which is the reflex of intellectual harmony of ideas and emotions. Where each of these systems is perfect of its kind, and both are wedded together, or set to each other, with such refined tact as to produce a perfect correspondence of the sensuous with the moral and intellectual impressions, we have a perfect poem. We are speaking of what does not exist in this world. Such poetry is, in fact, the common speech in heaven. Who has heard it among us? But let each of our poets be tried by how he acts to the best it can. We have to see how the art of Mr. Tennyson comes off in this performance.

A plain and homely subject, if it be one of genuine human interest, will serve the purpose of the greatest of poets. All the centralists of a most poetical theme are to be found in the commonest occurrences of human life. In birth and death, in youth and age, in sickness and health; in the relationship of husband and children, of brothers and sisters; in the mutual love of man and woman, with their passage of worship; in the marriage; in our daily experiences and comforts, and in all the conditions, physiological or moral, that arise from them, are the universal bonds of every generation of mankind, less an inexhaustible fund of poetry. It is because we are all of one blood—because we are grouped together in families; the adult pair, the father and mother, and their unmarried pupils dwelling in the same household—it is because the process of infancy, growth, and decay, repeated in each family, is the perpetual theme of all to each other by a sympathy which death itself cannot destroy—it is because of genuine human interest, that earthly existence that the meanest and poorest race of mortal men affords is the poetical subject that is the fittest for the poets. Here is a range of activities and affections that reaches the immortal life of man and also the science they are immortal. What do we care for their voluptuous feasts of nectar and ambrosia, when we see them in the winged chariots, their heartless intrigues and quarrels? The Iulus Tenders is a ripey contemporary, followed at a timid distance by the schipp and the dog that ran away with the spoon, and the cow that jump jast back at No. 7. She will beg him to spare her a feathing flow. Thirty years ago that a couple of the gods were born, we know their will be a couple of the dead, we know not what or where. Not all the advanced science or metamorphoses of a fanciful mythology and world of fairy can match the history of a single life's results in that affecting passage through this real world of ours. The poet who cannot make a poem of this is in some dilettante exercise of art and rebellious to God who made it, finds feel the lovely truest change of seasons, no change of weather, no change of vegetation, believes the monotonous magnificence of that perpetual scene.

And to all that exquisite isle, my dear,
There is but one bird with a musical thrust,
That it makes one very to hear.

Compare this little sketch with "The Palace of Art." We Wordsworth, and not with Shelley and Keats, but goes with light up the walks of our daily life, not wasted its radiance in etoods of fairy land, has wisely eschewed the preternatural, while looking to his faith in the real world, has not debeyed the mental things, the daily duty and love. So easily cherished, but which is not disposed to put up with a base metal for the genuine article, of reconciling Science with the intuitions of Love and Reverence, which is the most serious task of this age, has nowhere been so need not quote. The earlier, and to us the more delightful, of physical science, and the rules of historical probability, as any other branch of knowledge not, for the sake of effect in a purely diet of pure and magic which has formed so large a part of other poets' stock; because no excessive indulgence in this food of fancy unfits the mind for receiving historical or scientific truth. Because we find Mr. Tennyson in perfect concert with the intellectual habits of his age. The nineteenth century, whose praises he sings so well in his "Ode," is not yet all that he or we could wish; but it is distinguished by some qualities even better than its commercial and mechanical ingenuity, or its liberal and popular institutions of government. We, we think, a certain regard for truth—a manly rational dislike of all representations, even these avowedly fictitious, unless of the lightest and most sportive kind, which seem to outrage the taste unconsciously implanted in human nature by the existence of scientific studies, the effect has been to check—at least in England—the extravagance of self-indulgence in which characterised a few young and highly-gifted poets some forty years ago. There is no Byronings have perfected to use it within the limits of the actual and beyond for earnest speculations or devout religious faith.

We are therefore well content to find these new poems of Mr. Tennyson's resting, as they do, on the solid ground of earth; and, all the better, upon his native English soil. For he is a thoroughly national poet, who has not stooped himself in Greece or Italy, in Germany or Spain, absorbing the literary and social influences of a foreign clime; but kept himself at home with the feelings, the ideas, the manners, the traditions of the English people; with the evergreen meadows, the leafy and flowery hedgerows, the elm and oak and lawns of cottages, the parks and manor-houses, the villas and lawns of England; with the grey sky, the misty horizon, the moist wind, the surrounding walls of cliff and the bright beaches of sand or pebble, where the seas run up roaring to greet her so fondly takes a day; amid these scenes, with these associations, Mr. Tennyson has chosen to abide. He thinks like a highly-educated but unperverted English gentleman; he writes as he rather despises the French: he has not much sympathy with the age of chivalry, as the principal subject of his highly Court of Arthur, renowned in the legendary lore of the Round Table, and the Knights of the Hearth," as they were at first called, build domestic life of the English people in modern times. "Love and human character and condition; but two of these—"Aylmer's Field" and "Aylmer's Field" are cast in the narrative form; while "Sea Dreamers" is mainly a dialogue. The first-named poem—"Enoch Arden" though a fiction and "The Northern Farmer"—are in effect, reliquaries that classic dignity of style which pervades "The Idylls of the King," we have find the studied appearance of a carelessness of diction, and occasionally a looseness of construction, which is the result of consummate art. The effect of this is to give always so happy, Dreamers," and "The Northern Farmer" and after the first thirty lines. Probably, Mr. Tennyson knows what he is about, as well as his readers; but we have no rough passages of "Aylmer's Field," which are not much to our liking. We prefer, however, to leave these points to the reader to follow him along the calm, strong, equable course of his narrative in "Enoch Arden," which is one of the most perfect short tales in verse that we have ever read—as perfect as a tale can be, where the interest is so deep, without a touch or flaw, which held a noble vision moving within its clear crystal—and which he has shown to be a master of building.

The description of a fishing village is first engraved upon our memory with a few terse lines cut by the master's hand. He then leads us to look at the inhabitants in succession, as well as the cave in the cliff, where they play at keeping house. Enoch, being a strong boy, and these things will be matter of the house, and of Annie, the young town have fixed their hearts on this one girl. Philip is the rich miller's only son, Enoch is the child of a sailor, with nothing but his own industry and thrift to help him. He loves his employer's boys a better chance for Annie, who loves him, while Philip loves in silence:—

> to these were sad, and merrily rang the bells,
> And merrily ran the years, seven happy years of health and competence,
> And three children added to them,—
> With children—

This is the first cloud of the drama. The second is full of trouble. Enoch falls from a mast and breaks a limb. His wife's health is in a sickly one. Annie becomes their modest home. To provide for the bringing up of his children, he chooses himself to business of a sea-faring life to China, and fits up a little shop for Annie to keep in his absence. The children, and the wife, and the kids her farewell is extremely touching, but we must not dwell upon it.

Years pass by, and the husband and father still does not return. The ship is known to have been lost, but no one continues to wait for him. His little shop has failed; she is forlorn and poor; she has lost her youngest child, for

> Like a caged bird, escaping suddenly,
> The little innocent soul flitted away.

Then comes good Philip Ray, and helps her to rend the other boy to school. Enoch shall repay him when Enoch comes again. But more years pass, while Annie's sorrow continues to wait for autumn evening, when they have gone with the children nutting to the wood, he suddenly sees Enoch:—

> Oh! Annie,
> It is beyond me, I hope, against all chance,
> That he who left you so long since, so wrong,
> Should yet be living; well, then, let me speak:
> I grieve to see you poor and wanting help:
> I cannot help you as I wish to do
> Unless—forgive me if I seem unkind—
> You know what I would have you know.
> I wish you were his wife.

She bids him wait a year. When that time is past, she fears and lingers still. Philip is ready to know what Enoch is, she finds at random in her Bible three words, "Under a palm-tree," and she holds him to Philip and Annie are married.

And then Enoch? He was cast on an uninhabited island in a tropical climate. The description of his life of solitude is beautifully pictured. Yet more sublime is the glimpse into a spiritual mystery:—

> A phantom made of many phantoms moved
> Before him mouthing him, as he laboured
> Among the savage woodland, to and fro,
> The babes, the babes, the babes, they moved his house.
> The tiding dried, the mill, the leafy lanes,
> The horse he drove, the boat he sold, the chill
> November dawns, and dewy-glooming downs,
> The gentle doorway of the outer world,
> And the three sons of broken-hearted Annie.

Once likewise, in the middle of the night,
Thro' faintly, merrily—far and far away—
He seem'd to hear the chimes at home, and heard
Them, tho' he knew not wherefore, grow more clear
And louder, till himself was moving home
Returned upon him, had not his poor heart
Spoken with him, and said, "Thou fool, remember,
Let no one know that thou art living here."

Must we finish the story? Enoch Arden is taken from the isle; he is active in England; he reaches his native village; he is destitute, feeble, and unrecognised by all not recognised, he learns from a stranger what has become of his wife and children, and he himself, and will see them, and know that she is happy. He steals up to the window of Philip's house, and sees them all together:—

> Annie, whom he first saw strong and hale,
> His wife, his wife no more, and saw them move
> Here and there, order all things as they should,
> And all the warmth, the peace, the happiness,
> And his own children tall and beautiful,
> And him, that other, reigning in his place,
> Lord of his rights and of his children's love.
> Then he staggered and shook, and almost swooned, but forbore to cry out, and, falling prostrate, he prayed for strength of purpose, "Now I know, my God, that Thou hast forgiven me." So Enoch Arden lived a twelvemonth longer. He rent a deathbed message to his wife and children, to bless Philip, and to whom he had loved them to the last. And on the third night, in a loud calling of the sea, that night was fetched away. Crying with his last breath, "A sail! a sail! I am saved!" the lonely Enoch seemed escaped from his long desolation.

Such a story as this, told by such a poet, is beyond our further comment. Something we might say of the noblemen, the purity, the purpose of its conception; the simple eloquence, the power and cadence in its verse; but we have done with criticism, though not with enjoyment. We can not to point out the delicacies or the faults of the poet's genius in this collection. After "Enoch Arden," we find that "Aylmer's Field" seems tame, cold, and spasmodic. It should have been bound up with "Maud." In "Sea Dreams" we have an impressive lesson of the duty of Christian forgiveness, with an amiable example of a good wife and mother. The "Grandmother," with her memory of a long life, is a valuable psychological study. There is a certain grim humour and terrible truth in the shrill reproaches of the "Northern Farmer," set off by their quaint expression. Of the minor pieces which conclude the volume, including Mr. Tennyson's experiments with the classical metres, and that with is for "Enoch Arden" that this volume is not published before. It is very much more unequal than the former collection. Some pieces, however, are more unique as. She descends bearing truth in her right hand and mercy in her left, and she is welcome to the business the heart of man. The world has not grown cold. She pours from both hands, and they drink out of her cup the elixir of a higher spiritual life.

MUSIC.

THE two great music-meetings of this season are the Hereford Festival (the "Meeting of the Three Choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford") and the Birmingham Triennial Festival. The former week it will be followed by the Birmingham festival.

The meetings of the three choirs are on a much smaller scale than the festivals of Birmingham and Norwich; and at these meetings no attempt is ever made to bring forward new and original works. Hence, to musical people, their interest is of a secondary character, and they afford very little matter for musical description or criticism. We have, year after year, little matter for musical description or criticism. We have, year after year, little matter for musical description or criticism. and in the true the pieces, as well as the performers, are familiar. Nor is speaking, of the highest order of merit, that can be said about them has been often said already, and all that can be said about them now would be but a repetition.

The meetings of the Three Choirs are, however, the most fine musical entertainments, and their attraction is enhanced by the excellence of their object. The charity was established more than a century ago for the purpose of making a provision for the widows and orphans of clergymen within the dioceses of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford who have been left in poverty; and such is the necessity of such a provision there are no less than 147 beneficiaries at present. The receipts have increased under a hundred pounds a year. This certainly ought not to be, but it is; and the meetings of the three choirs do much to mitigate a crying evil.

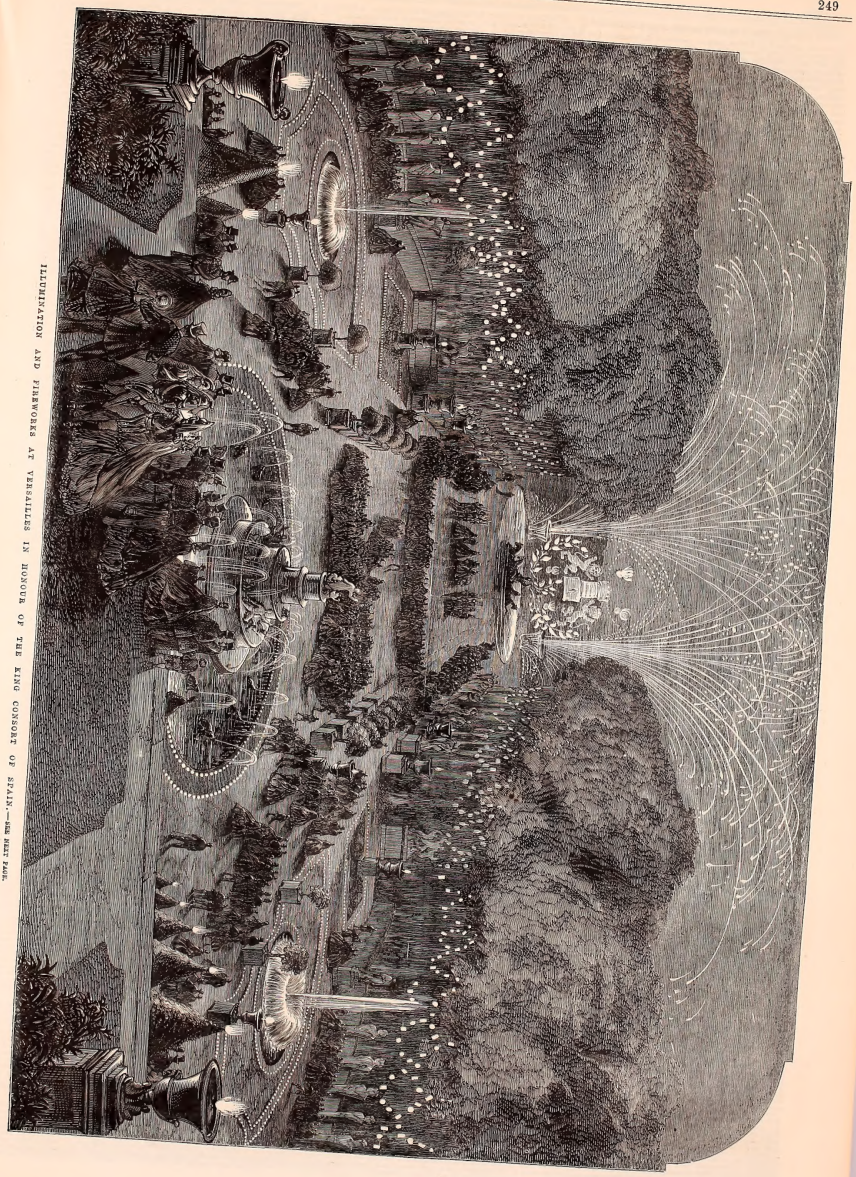
The oratorios and sacred pieces performed in the cathedral, during the week, have been, "The Creation," "Judas Maccabæus," "Israel in Egypt," the "Messiah," of Mendelssohn; "The Messiah," of Handel; with detached airs, duets, &c., selected from "Stabat Mater," "Israel in Egypt," "Judas Maccabæus," "Judas Maccabæus," Shirehall were made up of secular instrumental pieces, songs, &c. The principal vocal performers were Miss Dolby, Miss Rebecca Jewell, Mme. Sherrington, Mme. Dolby, Mdme. Weiss, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Montem Smith, Mr. Weiss, and Signor Belletti. The solo instrumentalists were Mr. Blagrove (violin), Mr. Harper (trumpet), and Mr. J. Collins (violoncello). The choirs and instrumental band were of the usual strength and quality.

We are not yet in a condition to report the financial result of this festival; but, as the receipts have generally been large, and the expenses moderate, we have no doubt that it has been very satisfactory.

THE THEATRES.

THE management at the New Adelphi evinces activity in the production of new and occasional pieces. One of the best of these was produced on Monday night, and is called "The Woman of Business." We believe that this comedietta proceeds from the pen of Mr. Benjamin Webster, the manager, and it does its author credit for its skill and tact. Probably it is an adaptation from the French, though we have not seen it in a recent work. It depends chiefly, both on the acting of Mrs. Stirling and Mr. J. Collins (Toodles), for its success, which is excellent. The strong-minded woman is now familiar enough to our boards, but we believe that she is never more attractively presented than in this production. Mrs. Hall, the wife of a wine merchant, is a pattern of prudence and prudence, and should be imitated by all wives who have partners who are liable to be led by other people. Mrs. Hall, finding that her husband combines on being herself his "guide, philosopher, and friend," undertakes all to realise all three characters. She undertakes all his affairs; she manages and takes things up upon by the arrival of an early client, Simon Foxcroft (Mr. J. L. Toole), who thinks, rode and smuggled as he is, that he is a strong fortune. Mrs. Hall does not see the matter in that light, and she is the wife of a wine merchant, and she has the matter in that light, and she is the wife of a wine merchant, and she has the matter in that light, and she is the wife of a wine merchant, and she has

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.



SIR SAMUEL O'MALLEY, BART.

Sir Samuel O'Malley, first Baronet of Rockhill, in the county of Mayo, was the representative of an old Irish family sprung directly from Bryan O'Cormack O'Malle, Lord of the Castle of Murrisk and of the manor of Strade, temp. Queen Elizabeth, and was the only son of Owen O'Malley, Esq., of Ardraccaw, in the county of Mayo, by his second wife, Anne, daughter of Samuel Bayly, Esq., of Newry, and grandaughter, maternally, of Brigadier-General Gibson. He was born on the 24th of December, 1779, and was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He was created a Baronet on the 2nd of July, 1804. Sir Samuel O'Malley's name has been associated with the public affairs of the county of Mayo for more than half a century, during which he was appointed a magistrate of the county of Mayo immediately on becoming of age, and he was for sixty-three years a justice and grand juror of that county. He was at the time of his death the magistrate and oldest Deputy Lieutenant. Sir Samuel was instrumental in the introduction of a railway into Mayo, which the first to propose the formation of a railway into Mayo, which he advocated for the last thirty years, and saw the accomplishment of the undertaking—a medium of wealth and civilisation—before the present Earl of Lucan; Sir Samuel, in writing of which, modestly observed that "The Mayo community appear disposed to show a proper degree of gratitude to Lord Lucan for securing that which would be a curse to remote and forgotten as it may be, without bringing wealth and prosperity portions of the north." Sir Samuel was a worthy Baronet, died suddenly on the 17th ult., at his seat, Kilbourne House, near Castlebar, and on the 26th ult., at his seat, Kilbourne House, near Castlebar, and on the 26th ult., at his seat, Kilbourne House, near Castlebar, and on the 26

ILLUMINATION AND FIREWORKS AT VERSAILLES IN HONOUR OF THE KING CONSORT OF SPAIN.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

RECEPTION OF THE KING OF SPAIN AT VERSAILLES.

In our last summary of foreign news we mentioned the ceremonial of the reception of King Francis of Spain at Versailles. Before proceeding with the explanation of our present illustration it may be worth while to mention that the fête given in the park of Versailles was the fifth since the creation of that wonderful production of Lenôtre, the first having been given in 1664, just two hundred years since. Although the spokesman of the fête offered to the King of Spain on the 26th of August was certainly very great, it was generally considered not to have equalled that provided in honour of Queen Victoria's visit to France in 1843, the year of the International Exhibition, and we are also when the enfants terribles between the Courts of the Tuileries and St. James was perfectly cordial. The concourse of foreigners in the "ville silencieuse" was very considerable; and, as usual, the Spanish element was abundant, but there were also present many Spaniards and Italians of distinction.

We now pass on to the description of the subject of our Engraving :—

ILLUMINATIONS AND FIREWORKS IN THE PARK OF VERSAILLES.

Our view of the beautiful scene is taken from the terrace immediately above the basin of Latona, shown in the foreground. It had been intended that the public would not be admitted to "assist" at the night fête in the park; but this order, which had, in fact, been placarded in different parts of the town, was rescinded by the Emperor, whose reception throughout the afternoon had been of the most enthusiastic description. The illumination of the parterres by coloured lamps was most effective when seen from above, and threw out into bold relief the elegant proportions of the fountain and statuary of the park itself, which was, moreover, at times, illuminated simultaneously by Bengal fires and the electric light. The fête was given by the Emperor named, the Empress, accompanied by an escort of Cent Gardes, descended into the park and took up the commanding position in the tapis vert, which is shown in our Engraving. From this time to the conclusion of the feu d'artifice, the din of bombs, cannon, and explosions never flagged; and the cannonade only ceased when the cuirassiers had bouquet, which was extremely beautiful.

While the causeur d'adieu was being given the Empress and her party regained the palace, where a splendid supper was served in the Galerie des Glaces, and continued the festivities. There was one o'clock in the morning when their Majesties quitted Versailles to regain the more habitable palace of St. Cloud; and soon after the glory of Louis XIV. was replaced in mouldy retirement, which is not likely soon again to be disturbed in a similar manner.

The death of Admiral Henry Lichfield took place yesterday week, in his seventy-eighth year.

Captain Lord Fane Charles Hamilton, of the Royal Navy, left on command of her Majesty's ship Esk, would, we learn from the Navy, have been received on board her Majesty for the distinction of Companion of the Military Division of the Order of the Bath, which was conferred upon him in which he was engaged in New Zealand.

The United Service Gazette states that the Admiralty have decreed that Greenwich Hospital shall no longer labour under the stigma of being a "refuge for destitution." It shall, on the contrary, henceforth be a fortune to be admitted are to be only helpless men, subjects for the infirmary or sick ward, but men on their account to be deemed to a state of "perfect blessedness," but that in their old age they may, if they please, have a hospital in a house. In other words, Pensioner Smith and Pensioner Jones of Greenwich pensioners should not please himself in his domestic arrangements as well as in his dress and manners.

An Act of Parliament was passed at the close of the late Session to provide "further" sums for contributions, and it seems that additional money will be required to meet the claims which are on hand and for executing a certain work. The Act authorises a sum of £500,000 to be issued for the purposes named, but the amount of the contributions already made is £1,000,000, under four enactments. By the Act 23 and 24 Victoria, cap. 120, £2,000,000 was granted, by the Act 24 and 25 Victoria, cap. 18, £1,000,000, by the Acts 25th and 27th Victoria, cap. 99, £650,000 ; and by the present Act a similar sum. Deducting from the total of £4,150,000 the £2,650,000 already issued, the 31st of March last, £1,854,816 ; the amount already voted, £2,650,000 ; the amount proposed this day, £500,000 ; and the further sum to complete the undertaking, £2,249,000. By the Act 25 and 26 Victoria, cap. 89, the Commissioners are empowered to borrow money on the security of the contributions.

The half-yearly inspection of the troops in Portsmouth garrison took place, on Tuesday afternoon, on Southsea common. They comprised H and K Batteries Royal Horse Artillery, under the command of Major Milman, from Hilsea ; the 20th Cumberlands, under the command of Colonel Gaynor, from Hilsea barracks, and the 109th Bengal Infantry, under the command of Colonel Stuart, C.B., and the 6th Regiment, under the command of Colonel Steele. The troops made up their garrison, and the 109th Bengal Infantry, a corps of artillery at the extreme right and left, with the infantry in the centre. Major-General Cooke, Deputy Adjutant-General, Royal Artillery, Dublin, arrived on the ground at three o'clock, accompanied by Colonel Commandant Worsley, R.A. ; Colonel Commandant Hutchinson, C.B., Colonel Gaynor, C.B., and Colonel Thackwell, A.A.G. ; Town-Major Brehm ; Captain St. John Paulet, A.D.C. etc. Her Majesty was represented by a general salute, after which the troops marched past in review order. This was followed by a few field operations in close column and a little firing. The inspection, which, on Tuesday, was a source of great attraction to summer visitors.

In another of this regimental orders, the depôt brigade of Royal Artillery assembled on parade on Monday morning to be present at the promulgation of the sentences upon a court-martial assembled on the gunnery at the Depôt and Coast Brigade who had been tried by a district court-martial on charges of having in their possession a quantity of woollen of cloth, cotton, leather, and other Government property which had been stolen from the Royal Artillery clothing stores, and which they were employed as cutters. The force having been drawn up in the usual form, the prisoners, who were guarded by the 3rd Artillery and the brigade announced that the decision of the court-martial had been approved by Major-General Sir Hope Grant, K.C.B., commanding-in-chief, and the following sentences upon the prisoners had been confirmed—namely, Corporal Pinkerman to be reduced to the ranks, and be imprisoned with hard labour for fifty-six days at Fort Clarence ; Gunners Harrison, Hill, and Gibbons to be imprisoned, with hard labour, for 112 days ; and Gunners Hooper, Marshall, Lock, Cameron, and Pearce to be imprisoned, with hard labour, for eighty-four days. Gunner Lindsay, in whose possession a quantity of unmanufactured shirts were found, was discharged from custody, the evidence not having been deemed conclusive in his case. The other prisoners were removed under military escort to undergo the punishment awarded, which involves the loss of benefits arising from former service. The articles identified as belonging to Government have been returned into store, but a considerable amount of property has not been recovered.

A brilliant field-day, by the whole of the troops at Aldershott, was held on Wednesday week, under the command of Lieutenant-General Sir L. Pennefather, K.C.B., who has just returned from a tour of military inspection on the Continent. The division formed up on the common, near the Royal Pavilion, at ten o'clock. In two lines, facing westward, the Royal Artillery and infantry in line of contiguous columns at quarter-distance, and the Royal Horse Artillery and cavalry in lined entrance columns at open order. The troops having marched past, the Lieutenant-General formed his army in order of battle, with his right upon Caesar's Camp and his left upon the hill. The three brigades of infantry advanced in parallel lines of regiments, at wheeling distance, with the cavalry and Armstrong guns covering the front of each brigade. The Royal Artillery advanced in line in rear of the skirmishers and the cavalry in rear of the Artillery. Artillery, and the 3rd brigade with the Royal Horse Artillery on their flanks. The enemy was supposed to be in position behind Seetbine, the west end of Long Valley, his right resting upon Bickley Copse, his centre upon Long-hill and Cockerow Farm, and his left upon Caesar's Camp. The combined armies lay the Long Valley and the arid plain to the eastward. The battle was commenced at eleven o'clock precisely, and lasted three hours. The enemy appeared to be to turn the left flank of the enemy and drive him from the strong position on Long-hill. About 1p.m. the grand decisive charge was opened by the whole line of skirmishers, and two batteries, posted on the Long-hill, kept up a continuous fire. The enemy's left was defended by Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar and Major-General Taylor each brought two regiments to the support of their skirmishers, and the attack on the left, still under cover of his skirmishers. The Royal Dragoons now dashed to the front of Seetbine, and, being brigaded together, they charged in close column, driving the enemy from both flanks. Prince Edward and General Taylor now rallied their forces, and it was evident that the Lieutenant-General was bringing the weight of his army to bear on the left and centre of the enemy's position. The Royal Horse Artillery, and Colonel Burr's brigades, the wheels of the artillery, and the fine brigade of cavalry under General Bulkeley, formed a combined attack upon the centre and left possession of Long-Hill, from which a dozen guns were quickly brought to bear. The left of the enemy's position was now overthrown, the pursuit was executed by the Royal Dragoons, Greys, and 14th Hussars, in succession, who dashed over the ground in the most splendid style. The enemy's retreat changes of position followed, by which the Lieutenant-General brought his army into the position it occupied at the end of the battle, facing the west, he drove the enemy in the direction of Crookham ; the artillery, posted on the hill, commanded the whole field, and the cannonade of musketry and fell back upon Brecon-hill, fairly beaten. "Cease firing" was then sounded, and the troops returned to quarters.

The annual prize-shooting of the Newport Rifles took place on Monday week at Keynsham. There were 167 competitors for the "all-comers" prizes. The cup was won by Ensign Trenayne (10th Cornwall), Sergeant-Major Sinnott (4th Devon Artillery), Corporal Hill (2nd Somerset), and Sergeant Ralph (1st Gloucester Regiment) third. The whole of the prizes in this class were of the value of £5. Sergeant Clarke, of the 2nd Devon Artillery, won the Lord Lieutenant's prize, representing a total money value of about £40, were also competed for.

A match has taken place between the Ely and Wisbeach corps, and the Ely side won, having made a score of 99 marks while the Wisbeach opponents obtained only 347 marks.

In Suffolk, for the fourth time, Sir C. Rowley, of Tendring Hall, has thrown open his grounds for a volunteer fete. The Sudbury, Hadleigh, and Stow Market companies assembled, mustering in all about 150, The three companies formed a battalion under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Austin, assisted by Captain and Adjutant Barmachelon. The volunteers were entertained by Sir Charles and Lady Rowley at one of their splendid annual banquets. The battalion consists of the 1st Suffolk, Bury St. Edmunds, 60th ; Sudbury, 61st ; Hadleigh, 62nd ; Stowmarket, 63rd ; Woodbridge, 64th ; and Framlingham, 65th. The following were shot :—Private Walton Burrell, Bury St. Edmunds ; second, Corporal Fisher, Ely ; third, Sergeant Norfolk, Bury St. Edmunds.—See Illustrations. On Monday week the Norwich Administrative Battalion, under the command of Colonel Boycott, assembled on Dunston Hill, for the purpose of undergoing inspection by Colonel Dibdeen, Assistant Inspector-General of Volunteers, and Major Loftus Dr Davis. The troops mustered before Heath, where they were reviewed. Colonel Dibdeen expressed himself pleased with the appearance of the battalion, and proceeded to the prize to the Horse Guards that the Norwich Battalion was perfectly up in drill.

In Lincolnshire a new rifle company has appointed a "preliminary committee." The Government Inspector has surveyed the carbine-range used by the company, and has conducted a practice-meeting for the encouragement of the band. The inspector suggests that the battery should make some arrangement for the use of the range for the joint use of their range and he has ordered that the two 32-pounder guns at the scalp battery, which have been in use during the past two years, be given as a special prize for again said.——A competition for prizes has taken place among members of the Spalding corps. On Saturday the recruits assembled on the south-west bridge, and marched through the principal streets. A match has taken place between Lieutenant Somerby and Private Marsden, on the one side, and Sergeant Mason and Corporal Watts on the other. These gentlemen are reputed the four best shots in the South corps. Lieutenant Somerby and Private Marsden made 112 marks and Sergeant Mason and Lance-Corporal Watts 115 marks.——The Barton corps has been entertained at Barrow Hall, the residence of Mr. Upjohn, the captain of the corps.——A silver cup, value ten guineas, given by Mr. Mason, the Co-Operative Store, Lincoln, was competed for on Monday week by eighteen first-class shots of the rifle corps connected with that establishment. The 37th Lancashire, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Gray, M.P., were inspected on Saturday week by Major Beevers, of her Majesty's 8th (King's) Regiment. The battalion mustered nearly 700 strong. They were brought to a variety of manœuvres by the commanding officer, after which Major Beynes made a brief address, in which he complimented both officers and men upon the proficiency which they had made in range, on Saturday, between the Bury and Wigan and the St. Helens battalion, from the 37th Lancashire Rifles, the latter corps gaining by so making a total of 693 against 641 by their opponents.——Last Saturday the volunteers marched to Bury, and were inspected by Major Beevers on a number of money prizes given annually by the officers. The money was divided into seven prizes, which were won by the following gentlemen in the order named :—Privates John Shaw, Andrew Walker, John Murray, Jonathan Mowray, John Bridge, Thomas Chadwick, and J. H. Hammond.

The Leeds Engineer Volunteers underwent their annual inspection on Saturday last, by Lieutenant-Colonel Harman, and the number of rank and file enumerated on the occasion was 756—the largest number of a single corps, as stated by the inspecting officer, which had ever taken place in Yorkshire. Lieutenant-Colonel Child was the commanding officer, and was assisted by Major Smith, a veteran who held rank in the old volunteer force more than fifty years ago. The marching by to the field was performed, and had to take place the River Aire had to be crossed, and this was effected by means of aqueduct-bridge which had been constructed by a party of the engineers. After the passage arrived, the bridge was speedily destroyed, so as to cut off the pursuit of the insurgent cavalry. On the 22nd the corps came into the neighbourhood of Gainesville, and on the 24th, encamped, in the presence of 30,000 spectators. The inspecting officer said he should make a most satisfactory report to the Secretary for War.——The Howden-cum-Asselby Rifle Club, Yorkshire, has awarded a handsome silver cup, given by Captain Clark, to be won twice to give actual possession. The Private Volunteer (a high wind prevailed) scored 34, and was thereby the winner for this year.——The 19th West York had a fifth and final competition for the challenge-prize given by Major Wormald, M.P. The cup to be won three times in five competitions, or to pass to the highest scorer. Private Brown was the winner for the day. No shooter lower down than the more than twice. Dr. Simpson having done that, the ownership reverted to the highest-scoring man in the five competitions, which also proved to be Dr. Simpson.——The Hull Volunteer Artillery competed with a 52-pounder gun for the challenge-shield given by Lieutenant-Colonel H. A. The artillerymen speak of Hull first, Sergeant Rada second, Gunner Bewlton third, and Major Spratt fourth. In another match the Hull Artillery matched a 9-pr. gun against Major Paten's fleet. The winner of the last contest also hit the target. The result was as follows:—Sergeant Rada, 5; Gunner Bewlton (Hull second, Sergeant-Major Murray third. The firing was very satisfactory.

The fourth annual competition for the prizes offered by and under the auspices of the Cumberland Consolidated Rifle Association took place at the Cumwhinton range, Carlisle, on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, of last week. GRAND FESTIVALS OF THE MUNICIPALITY AND ROYAL ACADEMY OF ANTWERP.

We have engraved, from sketches by our Special Artist, three Illustrations of the splendid festivals which took place at Antwerp during the week before last. The annual Kermesse, or festival of the patron saint of the municipality, an occasion which is always celebrated with much pomp in each of the Belgian cities, was combined in this instance with the two-hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the Antwerp Royal Academy of Arts, and with the jubilee, or fiftieth yearly meeting, of the Royal Society of Harmony; besides which, an exhibition of the works of living artists was opened by the Royal Society for the Encouragement of Art; and the Agricultural Society of the northern provinces of Belgium held a cattle show. Our large Engraving (on page 248) represents the procession to the Cathedral of Notre Dame, where a religious thanksgiving service, or Te Deum, was solemnly performed on the first day of the festival. This view was taken on the Place de Meir, which had been decorated for the occasion, after a design by M. Fischer, with two columns of crimson and gold, each surmounted by the Belgian lion, ornamented at the base and capital with gilt palm-leaves and encircled with coronets. A variety of flags and banners were ranged at intervals along the sides of the street. Looking down this vista towards the superb canopy of the high altar, and to the statue of Teniers with the effigies of the other founders of the Antwerp Academy seated in a semicircle around him, the effect was very imposing. A few hours later the inauguration of M. Van Arendonck's allegorical statue, or rather his group of sculpture, on the Grande Place, produced another interesting scene, which forms the subject of one of our Illustrations. It was in 1664 that one of the greatest of Flemish painters, David Teniers the younger, obtained from the Royal Government a charter for the establishment of the Antwerp Academy, which has succeeded to the functions of the ancient Guild of Saint Luke, formerly renowned as a corporation and school of artists. The bicentenary festival of 1864 was, therefore, appropriately chosen for a public commemoration of the fame of Teniers in connection with the history of his native town. The Governor, the Burgomaster, the members of the Municipal Corporation, and deputations from the principal colleges, and from the artistic, literary, and scientific societies of Antwerp, were present. The work of M. Van Arendonck, consisting of a female figure, which stands for the city of Antwerp, placing a crown upon the bust of Teniers, was then uncovered amidst the applause of the assembled company. We cannot find space to describe, or even to enumerate, all the ceremonies, shows, and entertainments which filled up the remaining days of this festival. The most important, perhaps, was a fair, "in the fashion of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries," held amidst the ruins of the old Bourse of Antwerp, destroyed by fire a few years ago. The chief architectural features of that building had been restored, provisionally, by M. Looymans, so far as to reproduce the effect of its interior when occupied by the stalls of the tradesmen, with a crowd of purchasers or spectators on the floor. We must, however, refer to our Illustration of this busy and animated scene.

WATERSPOUT SEEN OFF WORTHING ON SUNDAY, AUGUST 21.

THE WATERSPOUT OFF BRIGHTON AND WORTHING.

We have been favoured by the Rev. F. Piggott, of Worthing College, with the sketch we have engraved, showing the rare phenomenon of a waterspout beheld from Brighton and Worthing on Sunday, the 21st ult. He had an advantage in using the great elevation of the tower of Worthing College as an observatory on this occasion. The morning was very dull and thundery, attended with a few showers, and the lightning severe. The clouds were seen to be moving in all directions, some light and feathery, others heavy and of a grand appearance. The sea at the time (nine o'clock) was quite calm, with a slight breeze blowing from the N.E. At five minutes past nine the clouds were seen to revolve in a circle, about half a mile in diameter, and gradually approach the centre, which descended, diminishing in size, till, when about 50 ft. from the surface of the sea, it increased, and united with a dense vapour arising from the water in the shape of a cone. The sea for about a circle of 300 ft. was in a most disturbed state, the immense waves rolling to a centre and throwing up masses of foam. At 9.15 the waterspout broke, and an exceedingly heavy hailstorm attended its dissolution, some of the stones being about three quarters of an inch in diameter. The waterspout was distant from Worthing about two miles. The disturbed water travelled to the eastward at a rapid rate (nearly forty miles per hour), and when opposite Brighton another waterspout was formed, far more graceful in appearance than the first, the upper part not being so bulky, but much higher. Its existence, however, was but of short duration.

SCHOONER-RACE IN THE TORBAY REGATTA.

Our Engraving, from a sketch by Mr. G. Whitaker, an Exeter artist, represents the starting of the schooner yachts on Friday, the 19th ult., the second day of the Torbay Regatta, for the prize of £70. This was the principal race. The course was three times round the bay, starting from a point just outside the pier and Beacon Rock of Torquay. This is shown in our Illustration, which also takes in a distant view of Berry Head and Brixham, on the opposite side of Torbay. The yachts which were entered for this race were the Vestal, of seventy-four tons, belonging to Sir Bruce Chichester; the Madcap, of seventy tons, Mr. J. Abbott Dunbar; the Blue Bell, seventy-one tons, Mr. F. Edwards; and the Albertine, 153 tons, Lord Londesborough. These vessels got away at half-past twelve; but the wind died away in the afternoon, and after going once round the bay they were obliged to desist from the race. At that time the Madcap was a long way ahead. On the next day (Saturday, the 20th), the match was again sailed, the competing yachts being the Madcap, Albertine, and Blue Bell. The rules were that the course should be sailed over three times, the committee exercising the right of stopping the yachts after the second round, if there was no chance of doing the third in time. This right they exercised, for at eight o'clock only two rounds were finished. The Albertine was in about two minutes and a half ahead of the Madcap, but lost the prize, as she had to allow the Madcap nearly half an hour for difference of tonnage. The winner made the two rounds in exactly eight hours.

"HONOUR TO WHOM HONOUR."

THE public unveiling of the statue of Sir George Cornewall Lewis, at Hereford, on Saturday last, stands out from the prevalent political barrenness as a most gratifying incident—gratifying in all its phases. The public and private worth of the deceased statesman; the ancient city, in the principal square of which the memorial of him was erected; the cordial union of his neighbours of all political and ecclesiastical parties to do honour to his name; Baron Marochetti's statue, regarded as a work of art; the simplicity and truthfulness of the inscription; the presence of Lord Palmerston as chief actor in the ceremony, the speeches delivered, the enthusiasm of the crowd; and though last, not least, the thorough success of the occasion as a demonstration of respect—combine to throw around the event an atmosphere of attraction quite irresistible in its way. The inauguration may be said to have consecrated the week in which it came off—to have made it an ever-memorable one for the city of Hereford, and to have given it a claim to distinction even in the mind of the country at large.

Sir George Cornewall Lewis's qualities were pre-eminently of the English type. In no capacity did he exhibit brilliance; in all, his power was greater than his pretension. Honesty, industry, and supreme good sense—these were the primary elements of his character; but these, of which many a man can boast, were so combined, so applied, so favoured by outward circumstances, that the tribute of esteem paid to him by his friends did not exceed the truth—"a wise and honest statesman, a profound scholar, a kind and firm friend."

Honesty, it may be imagined, can give no fair claim to distinction in the present day. In the ordinary sense of the word this is true. But there is a much higher meaning in which the term applies to the late Right Hon. Baronet. His was an honest nature—that is, a nature which disposed him to conform his opinions and his practice to what is, rather than to what he might have wished to be. He did not seek the ultimate rule either of his judgment or of his conduct in his own will. His mind was that, not of a dictator, but of a disciple. He was impelled by an irrepressible instinct to look with earnestness, and in every direction, for the right, the true, the thing that ought to be law to man's mind. He was honest in that he never willingly looked askance, never overlooked what he knew to be present, never put the telescope to his blind eye lest he should see what might disturb foregone conclusions. As a philosopher, the discovery of truth was his sole object; as a politician, the conformity of his policy and his measures to what he deemed to be the highest expedience was his aim. We do not mean, of course, to credit Sir George Cornewall Lewis with a persistent effort to make his practical statesmanship exactly representative in all respects of his abstract conclusions. We cannot hold him to have been wholly incapable of those perturbations and deflections which personal feeling or party interests effect, to some extent, in the purest and most patriotic statesmen. But the force which made him revolve in the particular orbit which he illumined was honesty—the impulse of his nature to be true to its own impressions. Hence his caution, his seeming diffidence, his real modesty, his large-hearted catholicity; and hence also what those who looked only upon the surface of his character misinterpreted into sadducean indifferentism, slowness of apprehension, and coldness of temperament. He was too intent upon getting at accurate conclusions to abandon himself to the ardour of pursuit. He might be misled occasionally by his reverence for other minds—otherwise, he never hesitated towards, far less leapt to, his conclusions. And this made him pre-eminently a safe man—valuable in council, not so much for fertility of resource as for carefulness and impartiality in his habits of judgment.

Sir George's industry was prodigious. His power of work, enhanced as it was by the logical completeness of his method, astonished the official mind. It was plain to every observer that he had not been trained in the Circumlocution Office. He could not dawdle, though, in manner, he might be slow. He got through more business in less than most men could do, and, when we say he "got through" it, we mean that he did it thoroughly. He "scamped" nothing—he could not—it was not within the range of his capabilities. Whatever could be acquired by patient research he acquired; whatever could be mastered by industry he made his own. His memorandums on state affairs invariably well up in his information, and generally so clear and precise in his statement of it that, in this respect, he seen came to be trusted on all sides as a sufficient authority. And yet, although he successively filled three high offices of State, and filled them with a constantly growing reputation, his statesmanship appears to have been but the byplay of his life. He had roamed over the whole expanse of literature, and had made himself familiar with its most out-of-the-way nooks and corners. Few men of the age had so minutely studied the whole range of ancient and modern literary achievements have come down to us. His published works abound with illustrations which, one may see at a glance, could only have been picked up in districts far removed from the highways of erudition, in the remote, the generally unknown, the almost inaccessible regions of letters. The traces of his industry, never obtrusive, are nevertheless apparent in all that he wrote, and came out with impressive distinctness, at times in his Parliamentary speeches. Perhaps no man of these times has more successfully than the late Right Hon. Baronet seconded good intentions by indefatigable endeavour. In short, the management of life or of politics in which he figured he figured as a workman—as one who discharged whatever he undertook with earnest and indomitable activity.

But Sir George Lewis's crowning quality, especially in his capacity as a statesman, was his supreme good sense. He appeared to understand men almost as well as he understood books, and could consult their present interests wellnigh as successfully as he could penetrate their past ideas and habits. The clearness and honesty of his purposes, conjoined with the fulness of his information and the depth of his research, helped to give a certain practicalness and solidity to his judgment, which, in the domain of politics, are invaluable. The quality of which we speak is due in part to natural endowment. It is not of every honest and industrious man that one can predicate the possession of good sense. In part, also, it would appear to be the exercise of industry and honesty; in other words, his good sense was both a talent and an acquisition. Whatever may have been its origin, it was conspicuous in his whole bearing. He was not showy. There was nothing meteoric about his movements or his statements. It could hardly be maintained that he was original or that his genius was of the imaginative order; but he had his own way of doing things, and was endowed with genius, nevertheless. His aptitude in discerning just what was wanted, and in framing his measures to meet the want and no more, was unmistakable. There was no surplusage, no waste of material, no exuberance either of promise or performance in his political propositions. They usually covered precisely the absolute need of the time, but were never carried beyond its limits. Men could see from his acts that he was really intent upon doing what really required to be done, and that he knew how to do it, but that the deed and not the manner of it was what engaged his notice. He was more concerned that the contents of the dish should be wholesome and nutritive than that they should be re-commended to the appetite by any elegance or piquancy of garnish. He generally saw the mark at which he was to aim, and, practically, he seldom missed it.

One cannot but rejoice that those among whom he had his home and who knew his social as well as his political virtues, have erected a memorial worthy of him, of themselves, and of the city it will hereafter adorn. There was unusual appropriateness, too, in the choice of Lord Palmerston to inaugurate the statue. The venerable Prime Minister first placed Sir G. C. Lewis in high political office, and has probably owed something of his own success to the solid qualities of his colleague. In truth, every feature of the ceremony, as well as the statue itself, which was thereby dedicated to the public, struck us as having a remarkable fitness in it, as being in keeping with the character of the man to whose memory it was designed to pay a becoming tribute of honour.

The occasion naturally suggests the reflection that in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland—indeed, one may fairly say, all the world over—real work seldom misses a correspondent reward. The Right Hon. Baronet could not boast of high social rank. His powers of mind were not extraordinary. Nature had not done for him much beyond what she does for the majority of men in middle-class, well-to-do life. But, then, he made the very best use of the opportunities and the intellectual faculties which he had—undervaluing nothing, wasting nothing of the gifts he received. He put to give account, and which he might improve by use. And this, perhaps, is the surest road which can be taken to distinction. Few who are resolved to excel ultimately throw away their labour. Sir George Cornewall Lewis's career presents an encouraging example to men whose highest aim is to improve their capacity and disposition to work. In view of the monument which now adorns St. Peter's-square, Hereford, no Englishman can well make light of the rewards of industry; but, turning a glance inward from the honoured statesman to himself, he may refire to his home stimulating fresh efforts by a remembrance of the line—

But slow and steady wins the race!

A LIGHT LOAD FROM THE LAST-READ FIELD.

Harvest is preverbially a joyous time. The heart of the husbandman is at rest when his crops are gathered in, and he is more than repaid for his many months of anxious care. "In northern climes," observes Knight, "that is especially the time, and the sky is closely scanned for signs of the rains and storms which sometimes make our autumn unlovely, and set at nought all the husbandman's labour. Proportionably great is his consequent joy when a continuance of genial weather ripens the crops and enables them to be safely garnered. Nor is this gratitude for a bountiful harvest confined to a section; it is shared by the whole community, and the thanksgivings ascend to Heaven with the joy it, however, more particularly felt in the country. In the very face, as it were, of the happy harvest, the labour of the husbandman, and his hospitality and good will universally obtain. The custom of giving a supper to the harvest folk has been observed from time immemorial, and, though it is true, these annual suppers have degenerated into saturnalia; and attempts, in most cases attended with success, have been made of late years to check some of the worst of the hilarity of the season within the bounds of propriety without depriving the day of its characteristic. The jollity of the season is universally felt, and a rollicking hilarity succeeds to labour apparent. This is happily shown by our Artist in the scene depicted by him on the preceding page. The last harvest load—the labour of the last harvest-field—is now given over to the intoxication of the time, and his child is perched on the lighter load and fained shed from the last-reaped field. The girl does not seem quite at ease on her extemporized throne, nor do the children who look on at their father's labour. But the father manages it all. The fair occupant will soon be accustomed to her seat of honour, and so get over the little confusion which, in common with her sisters of more exalted rank, she naturally feels; and the flickering smile on the faces of the onlookers will quickly broaden into a grin. To pursue the subject would be to intimate that our Artist has laboured in vain, or rudely to imply dulness on the part of our readers. The figures have in them a thoroughly expressive life in picture. Let us be thankful, in conclusion, to the Giver of all Good for having granted such a bright and cheering season to mankind in the simple exercise of their faculties; and may our labouring population have their toils more and more lightened by innocent mirth and graceful relaxation!

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Emperor and the Prince Imperial left the camp of Châlons at noon on Saturday, and arrived at St. Cloud at half-past four, accompanied by Prince Napoleon and Prince Humbert Bombardy. His Majesty has recovered from the indisposition—said to be a sharp attack of the cholera—under which he suffered at Châlons. Prince Humbert met with an enthusiastic reception at the camp, his martial bearing and soldierly tastes having made a favourable impression among the troops.

The review of honour at the camp took place yesterday week. At twelve the Emperor left the Imperial quarters, preceded by a detachment of Cent Gardes, and accompanied by the Prince Imperial, wearing the uniform of the regiment of the Line, Prince Humbert, and Prince Napoleon. Behind the Emperor came Marshals M'Mahon and Forey, General Fleury, and Count de Montebello, Prince de Windischgratz, and a number of Marshals-de-Camp and cavalry officers. The Imperial party took up a position before the grand pavilion, and the Emperor, dismounting, gave the word, "Vive l'Empereur!" and "Vive l'Empereur!" and "Vive le Prince Impérial!" His Majesty made a short address to the troops, and re-mounted several times and rode along the line. The defile took place and the review terminated. A few minutes later his Majesty and his illustrious guests left the camp on their way to the Imperial residence at Champagne. In the evening there was a display of fireworks presented by the Emperor to the troops encamped around Châlons, after which appeared the words, "Vive l'Empereur!" and the day terminated with a retreat by torchlight.

On Monday the Emperor received Mr. Bonher, Drouyn de Lhuys, and Rouher. A Ministerial Council was held on Wednesday.

The Empress and Prince Imperial arrived, on the 25th, at the fashionable spa towns of Vichy, where it is expected she will remain a month. Her Majesty travelled incognito.

Marshal de M'Mahon, Duke of Magenta, has been appointed Governor of Algeria.

The Patrie and France announce that the Council of State has adopted a project for according an annual pension of 20,000f. to the widows and children of the late Marshal Pelissier.

M. Béhic, the Minister of the Interior, has issued a circular addressed to military authorities, calling upon them to insist on enforcing the regulations against masking in railway carriages.

The once-celebrated Fête Enfantin, the founder, or rather the restorer, of which was Prosper Enfantin, in the first years of the reign of Louis Philippe, died of apoplexy, in Paris, on Thursday week, aged sixty-eight. He has left 400,000f. (£16,000) to his son, and his property, of which he had a great number, he bequeathed to the library of the Arsenal.

A new and very ornamente treaty has been signed, allowing the establishment of a French protectorate in six provinces of Lower Cochin-China, the opening of three large ports on the Annam coast; enire liberty to French missionaries to propagate the Christian religion throughout the kingdom; the establishment of consular agents as in Siam, and a pecuniary indemnity; part payment of an indemnity of 100,000,000f. (£4,000,000) to the French Government.

SWITZERLAND.

The Federal Council have declared the election of M. Chenevière to the Geneva Council of State to be valid. No further disturbances had occured, and the city of Geneva is reported to be quiet. M. Fazy, the leader of the Radical party, has quitted Geneva suddenly. Being cited before the Juge d'Instruction, he published a statement in a newspaper to the effect that he had retired to the frontier to escape assassination and to await a period of reaction.

The Mexican Envoy has been received by the Federal Council.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have arrived in Denmark. Some particulars of their Royal Highness's reception are given on page 258.

The Grand Duke of Russia arrived at Copenhagen last week, and his betrothal with Princess Dagmar, second daughter of the King, is spoken of as to take place shortly.

The session of the Danish Rigsraad was closed on Thursday week by a short message, in which the King declared that, in case of need, he will convoke the Chambers for an extraordinary Session.

A series of hitherto unpublished documents was laid before the Rigsraad prior to its prorogation. These documents relate to the negotiations which were in progress during the autumn and winter of last year between the Governments of Denmark and Sweden for an alliance to defend the Eider-Danes against the German invasion of Schleswig. They are of much interest in many passages as showing the hopes and promises on which Denmark relied, and how near at one time she seemed to approach to their realization.

Some delay appears to have arisen in continuing the peace negotiations with Prussia. The German papers lay the blame on the Ministers of Copenhagen, the Danish journals on those of Berlin.

GREECE.

The National Assembly of Athens is still engaged in revising the Constitution. After the election of the new president, M. Messines, which is a triumph for the National party, the Assembly voted a series of articles of the Constitution, the second of which decrees "that the bishops and priests of the Catholic Church must be Greek citizens; and the fifth, "that titles of nobility and distinction shall neither be recognised nor conferred."

AMERICA.

There has been a fierce struggle between Generals Lee and Grant for the Weldon Railway. On the 19th ult. the Federals took up a position on it, but were surprised and driven back, with a loss of 3000 killed and wounded. The Federals, being strongly reinforced, regained the position; and, though the Confederates made another effort to dislodge them, they remained in intrenched position at the Reams station on the 27th. The Weldon line was of great value to the Confederates, as by it a large portion of their supplies from Wilmington, Charleston, and the Carolinas was brought.

An engagement took place in the Shenandoah Valley on the 21st ult., between Generals Early and Sheridan, near Charlestown. The loss on both sides was severe; but apparently the latter had the worst of it, for he fell back to Harper's Ferry, since past which place Early, on the Virginia side. Early proceeded to Martinsburg, whither it was reported General Lee was moving to join him with the larger force, with the intention of invading Maryland.

Sherman's position in front of Atlanta was said to be unaltered, but his enemy had cut the railway to the Macon railroad. As this is the sole line along which supplies for the defenders of Atlanta can be brought, its destruction is an important achievement. On the other side, the Confederate Wheeler had cut the Knoxville and Chattanooga railway, since which time the Federal supplies were brought.

From Mobile we have news that the Federal troops from Pensacola were advancing to the bay, and General Granger was within five miles of Fort Morgan. On the 16th ult. The Federal fleet was preparing to attack Mobile harbour, rendering access to the city impossible until removed.

General Fremont has consented to withdraw if President Lincoln will do the same.

The Victoria, the London packet-ship which had Frank Miller, the suspected murderer of Mr. Briggs, on board, arrived at New York on the 24th ult. Mr. Death, of Cheapside, jeweller, identified the property as being the man who bartered Mr. Briggs's chain with him; and the coleman, Mr. Jones, gave evidence to the effect that the proceedings precedent to his extradition for trial in England were progressing on the 27th ult.

THE BAYONNE EXHIBITION.

Bayonne, August.

In this busy capital of the department of the Lower Pyrenees, at the confluence of the Nive with the Adour, 3½ miles upstream, in the spot where the combles from Biarritz salute the dark-eyed senoras under their black mantillas, and a little nearer to picturesque Spain, up with a little of Paris, there has been gathered behind a painted portico an Exhibition of the Industry and Art of the country and Spain.

The Exhibition was built by shares, which appear to have been taken up mainly by the Municipality and the merchants of Pau and Bayonne. There are only a few Spanish shareholders. The commission charged with the government of the Exhibition includes the prefect of the department and the sub-prefect of Bayonne. There are three sub-commissions—viz., the Commission for Agriculture, that for Industry, and that for Art. I am directed M. G. de Salamanca is, I see, honorary president of the Fine Arts subcommission. The administrative body, in the centre of the whole concern of the Exhibition into three sections and a number of classes and divisions, and the writer who supplies the contents of the Illustrated Catalogue grouped methodically after the plan laid down in the catalogue will be gravely disappointed when on entering the park by the main entrance, where the flags abound and there is the usual supply of mancuvery offices, the visitor reaches the central chamber or section of the Exhibition. It is arranged with a view to a rich effect. Arbuscan carpets and tapestries hang around the walls; the central space is occupied by a vast stall covered with bright-coloured porcelain. There are some good pieces from this source, but the main impression is that of a stall of tasteful inlaid cabinet-work and some pretty designs in jewellery. Fronting the entrance is a bust of Napoleon III. The contents of this central section, which is the first compelled, are happily contrasted; and the effect is decidedly improved with the open air character of the picture-gallery at once. To the right and left stretch the courts. To the right are the musical instruments; the furniture, the tissues, the carriages, the chemical products, the small machinery, as sewing-machines &c.; and varieties of metal-work, and cooking apparatus &c. &c. To the left are the porcelain and glass, the stuffs and lace, the leather, the paper, the cutlery, and the articles of food. Interspersed between the courts, which are laid out in the open air (Algeria on a scant space), the agricultural implements, the products of the forest, the glue, the gutta-percha, the specimens of modern agricultural improvements. Behind the Exhibition should be a garden for music and for the amusements. Behind the garden at points with groups of statuary. There is a bustle, music, and animation at the Exhibition, which promises well for a concourse which, under such favourable circumstances, must be successful.

Let us now see the general plan of the Franco-Spanish Exhibition. Of its general merits it may be justly said that it has little that is new to present to the attention of the visitor. It is the stronger for the attraction (to which I shall direct the reader's attention); but, in the main, the contents offer nothing new to the critician of the last who studied the Paris Exhibition of 1855 and the London Universal Exhibition of 1862. There are many fine specimens of French upholstery. There are some well-built and remarkably cheap carriages by French provincial dealers; there is some really large fabric (being crowned about a case of elegant and admirably cheap shoes and slippers (but then they have wooden soles), and the skills of statistician reconsult patronised. But, I repeat, I see little that I have not already seen.

The Spanish contributions are promises of future excellence rather than serious attempts to snatch prizes for industrial excellence from the French. In the agricultural department only do the Spaniards make a serious and, it must be added, in justice, a forcible show. They have some rousing machines of novel construction; and their collection of agricultural products is an extensive one. Along stands, or arranged fantastically against the walls, are various Spanish wines, the high and the common; a series of wheats, &c., from the Agricultural Society of Burgos; oil and wines from Saragossa, Cordova, &c.; wool and vinegar from Logrono; cheeses from the model farm of Guipuzcoa; a collection of woods won by the Ranger of the forests of Burgos; flour from Vittoria; a complete series of the products, animal and vegetable, of the province of Navarre; and a priced collection of agricultural machinery from Pinagny and Savoy, of Tarrigona. The Algerine court is furnished as I have already seen Algerian courts in industrial exhibitions more than once. There are the usual collections of cards, of handsome wools (that of Ernest Lamoriel, the inspector of the forests of Blue, in the province of Constantine), of the essences of roses, &c. The most remarkable samples in the Algerine court are blocks of cedar-wood 400 years old. The tissues, the fibres, the grains are of average excellence. It is pleasing to see them here, and to feel that there are so many independent, industrial men in Algeria who are alive to the use and aim of exhibitions of industry.

The part of the Exhibition, however, which interested me more than the glittering court of Paris jewellers and embroiderers' was one that related to the agricultural department where the products of the Landes are grouped. The immense pine forests of the Landes, and resin, and tarpaulin, are not many. The Government have from time to time done its utmost to improve and increase these wilderness-like tracts of land, but success has not to nothing. Crops will not grow upon them. They are the abode of wild-deer; the wolf has not left them; sheep that are reared there are of coarse lankage are poor, and their wool is coarse. They will grow only the pine (the resinous, the cork-tree, and, here and there, the chestnut), where the barrenness approaches fruitful oases we find space crops of Indian corn. The rather vast flat sandy tracts, the pathless solitudes, through which the traveller sees in the distance, twenty miles apart, two shepherds stretching like cranes over the bourn, flat plain, upon their stilts. The immense forests of turpentine gatherers of the Landes are a strange race. They have customs that have dwelt with them for centuries. How should they change? Not the simple, laughable contented shepherds of the Landes have only the most slender degree of connection with the world of cities and civilisation in which we live. They will learn perhaps thirty years hence that which is make patent to the readers here set forth to-day; but they are few. Their secluded lies in any shed he finds within ken at nightfall.

The corner, then, in which the few valuable products of the Landes are grouped cannot but have a special interest to all who know the solitudes from which they have been brought to town. We see there the resinous honey which the bees gather from the miles of purple heather of the Landes is good, but not equal to that of Narbonne. Are the bees of the Landes then, cast in rougher mould than those of Narbonne? and do they perform their labours with more than skilful, but unskilful which they perform? Perhaps the fiery heather under cloudless skies misses some of the delicacy of flavour which the bee of Narbonne distils from the more cool and moist atmosphere? Perhaps these new hives, ranged to fall under the eyes of the work-folk who find their way here from their settlements in the Landes, will add to the luxury of the Lower Pyrenees on a par with that of Narbonne.

By the side of honey of wheat (and honey of the flowers reared in the Landes, the stars of maize, the fruits of this warm south (which the flies are doing their industrious best to ripen in the exhibition cloister), the great interests and contrivances for making wine, preserving grapes, and fertilising the vine against the deadly attacks of the oidium, are shown. The most interesting agricultural department are some admirably effective samples of exhaust-work for the sub-soil-plough from Wood of Dartford, and a model spinous in the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1855.

The machinery for the wool-finished machines exhibited by Vessey and Co., of Lourdes, in the Spanish gallery, wisepresses, an apparatus for heads some pressing bales, a fan-blowing and winnowing machine, and a manufacturing reiter-water, some of which are the most valuable of these exhibitions agricultural implements. A proof of the vitality of these exhibitions of industry that the great interest which the Paris jewellers, many of them of the most wonderful and calculated to display the most consummate taste, have excited. Fanciers H. Cire, Drapier, and Co., of Bordeaux; and M. Brenet, of the Palais Royal, Machinaires, Paris, &c., their productions are exhibited in a manner as to show that is held more than 400 miles away from Paris. They are in the Spanish gallery; they are not exhibited in a way of any importance to the comparatively new, but is certainly efficacious. It is specially efficacious for the display of cheap articles which are intended to be sold to some of the Irish exhibitors of bog-oak ornaments were witness, to the consternation of the Irishmen, of the Irish Court, in the Industrial Store in 1853. Mr. Brenet, a vendor of "artistic jetrifactions and incrustations" from "the mineral sources of Auvergne," who is a good French name, and who exhibited in 1855. His case of incrustations is always open; and very pretty some of these incrustations are. They are of flowers and fruits, and of every description of the water: the water gradually forming a deposit or crust over the model. The result is that it was impossible to see what was made of or upon the mould. The exhibitor told me that the process was his secret.—It was his living. He had some fragments of such snakes which, as to natural objects themselves. They were surprisingly true and lifelike, and I was invited to state that it was impossible to say that they were not. It is no perfect in all its proportions as this incrustation of a living frog was. The incrustation was being done in Auvergne, and by it sell to the trade, any regulations of commissioners to the contrary notwithstanding. Close by this business-like incrustator are the cases of Fanciers Fils, Paris, "Fabricants de broderies," in ivory and other materials. He exhibits a basin or bay, with ivory ships at anchor in a sea of marvellous still and splendid prices. He has representation of Biarritz by minute carving less remarkable. His ships rise and sink upon a sea of glass which seems to be in motion. The effect is very naturally.

Not far from this ivory-work are the teight—nay, gaudy, Spanish figures of ministers and lovers on horseback, &c., by Antonio Marin, of Malaga. They are equally remarkable, and Spanish also in their way, as the incrustations about them for the simple reason that they are opposite a series of rough water-colour drawings by Eugène Delacroix. These drawings are of horses figures. They are thrown upon the paper with a few masterly strokes of the brush. A Spanish dance is sketched in a few lines; and Delacroix's mastery of light and shade, and of his case when in a sketching mood. Nothing is finished. A sketch is a sketch, and is not by any means of consistency to the contrary notwithstanding. Close by this business-like drawing are the cases of Messrs. Lemaire, Parent, and Co., "Fabricants de dentelles," in ivory and other materials. He exhibits a basin or bay, with ivory ships at anchor in a sea of marvellous still and splendid prices. He has representation of Biarritz by minute carving less remarkable. His ships rise and sink upon a sea of glass which seems to be in motion. The effect is very naturally.

In fact, he is simply going to annihilate them, and to give their property and the Government of the land to the Hindoos. Two years are given him either to leave the country or to be annihilated.

INAUGURATION BY HER MAJESTY OF THE STATUE OF THE LATE PRINCE CONSORT AT PERTH.

ON Tuesday week her Majesty the Queen inaugurated, with solemn ceremonial, the statue which has been raised to the memory of the late Prince Consort by the city of Perth. The statue, represented by our Engraving, has been executed by Mr. William Brodie, R.S.A., of Edinburgh, whose work has justified the Perth committee in their selection of a native sculptor for the execution of a Scottish memorial of the lamented Prince. The material was supplied by a fine block of pure freestone from Redhall Quarry. The figure is nine feet in height. It represents the Prince attired in the robes of a Knight of the Ancient Order of the Thistle. The dress is the doublet and trunk hose of the Old Scottish Court; and the figure bears not only the insignia of the Scottish but also of the great English order of knighthood, the Garter being worn below the left knee. The collar and star of the Thistle show very effectively on the richly-ornamented doublet, and the mantle falls gracefully in rear of the figure. The right hand rests on a square column, or pedestal, and holds an open scroll, on which the outlines of the Exhibition building of 1851 may be traced. The likeness is excellent, and the whole figure serves well to recall the Prince just as he was removed from among us. In the course of the execution of the model, Mr. Brodie had the advantage of several visits from Prince Alfred during his residence in Edinburgh last winter; and his Royal Highness also saw the statue, when nearly finished, in the sculptor's studio a few weeks ago. The statue was highly approved by the Prince, who contributed some important suggestions to the sculptor, both as to likeness and costume; and her Majesty, to whom a photograph of the work was sent, was so gratified with the result that she signified her gracious pleasure to attend its inauguration.

The site chosen for the statue is on the North Inch of Perth, in the corner nearest to the Bridge of Tay. The figure is set upon a pedestal 13 ft. high, making the whole height 22 ft. The pedestal is octagonal, approached by four octagonal graduated steps, and is surrounded by a circular railing of bronzed malleable iron of a star cross and floral pattern. The railing was beautifully festooned with a series of wreaths and with mottoes. Over the whole was the Prince's motto, "Treu and fest," and underneath were the chaplets—namely, first, the cypress, emblematical of grief, with the words, "Multis ille flebilis occidit;" second, the immortelle, symbol of immortality, with the scroll, "Non omnis moriar;" and, third, the olive, significant of peace, with the motto, "Wisdom is better than weapons of war."

In preparation for the ceremony the ground in the vicinity of the statue was inclosed and kept clear. The pavilion for her Majesty was a most tasteful erection; the front presented four shafts with floral capitals, and three arches, the central one being appropriated for the Queen. The pavilion was hung with crimson cloth and festooned with evergreens and flowers, with crimson hangings to let down in case of rain. The whole route from the railway station to the site was thronged. The railway-trains and conveyances from the country poured in crowds of visitors, and the townspeople gathered early to witness the spectacle. The weather was sunny and fair. The train bringing the Queen, the younger members of the Royal family, and suite arrived at Perth from Windsor at twenty minutes to nine. Her Majesty was accompanied by the Princesses Helena, Louisa, and Beatrice, and Prince Leopold, and also by the Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg Gotha. In the Royal suite were the Marchioness of Ely, the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, Sir Charles Wood, General Grey, General Seymour, General Hood, Sir C. Phipps, Dr. Jenner, &c. The Royal party were received at the station by the Lord Provost and magistrates, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, the directors and officials of the railway, the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute, and the Procurator Fiscal. At twenty minutes before ten the Royal party, accompanied by the Lord Provost, magistrates, and town council, the Hon. Arthur Kinnaird, M.P. for the city, the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, the members of the Conveners' Court, and the members of the memorial committee, proceeded in state to the site of the statue, via Marshal-place, Princes-street, St. John-street, George-street, and Charlotte-street. The procession was escorted by a squadron of cavalry (two troops of the 15th Hussars) and the streets were lined with detachments of Highlanders and other regiments brought for the occasion from various garrisons in Scotland. Several companies of Perthshire volunteers were also on the ground. The troops were commanded by General Walker, C.B., the head of the North British Staff. On arriving at the site the municipal bodies, the memorial committee, and the high constables took up their places within the barrier, along with the guard of honour of the 92nd Highlanders and band of that regiment. A large company were accommodated within the Royal pavilion, including the Lord Provost and magistrates of Perth, the Earl of Mansfield, Viscount Strathallan, Lord Grey, Lord Kinnaird, Lord and Lady Blanche Dupplin; Sir John, Lady, and Mrs. Richardson; the Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P.; Sir John Ogilvy, M.P.; Sir Patrick Threipland, Sir J. Stuart Forbes, and the Lord Provost of Edinburgh.

The ceremony was brief but impressive. On the Queen's arrival the band of the 92nd played one stanza of the National Anthem. The Rev. Mr. Burden, minister of East Church, Perth, offered a prayer that the Almighty would prosper and guard the work that they had finished, prolong her Majesty's reign, and fill it with the blessings of peace, of progress, and of Christian enterprise. The Lord Provost of Perth presented a loyal and dutiful address to her Majesty:—

"Most excellent Majesty, most gracious Majesty.—We, your Majesty's dutiful subjects, the Lord Provost, magistrates, and Town Council, as representing the community of Perth, beg leave to approach your Majesty with the renewed assurance of attachment to your Majesty's person, family, and throne. At all times gratified by your Majesty's visits to our ancient city, we feel especially honoured by the kindness and condescension with which your Majesty has been pleased to grace by your Royal presence the interesting ceremonial which is now to take place. May the memorial this day to be inaugurated be an enduring testimony of gratitude, affection and respect! May it stimulate the men of coming generations to the practice of those virtues which shone forth so conspicuously in the character of him whose name it commemorates! Assured that such will ever no less command the praise and gratitude of the living than secure the admiration and applause of posterity, we feel that no inauguration of our city's memorial of 'Albert the Good' can be more appropriate or graceful than that which proceeds under the auspices of the equally good and gracious Sovereign to whom the lamented Prince stood connected by the nearest and dearest of human ties, and under whose just, beneficent, and exemplary rule her subjects have made unprecedented progress in everything fitted to render a nation great, prosperous, and happy. That your Majesty may be long spared to sway the sceptre of these realms, and to be a blessing, a guide, and an example to a contented, loyal, and devoted people, is our sincere and earnest prayer."

The statue was then uncovered, and the guard of honour presented arms, the band of the 92nd played the National Anthem, the pipes of the Highland regiments sounded a pibroch, and a battery of artillery placed at the top of the Inch fired a Royal salute. A cheer, too, was raised by the assembly, but somewhat subdued by the thought that the memorial was for one too early lost, and the greatest loser of all was present at the ceremony—so her necessarily one of sad and melancholy interest. The sight of the statue, however, drew forth many expressions of admiration. Having silently regarded the figure for a few minutes, the Queen turned round, and, commanding the Lord Provost of the city, Mr. David Ross, to kneel, conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. Her Majesty expressed to him her satisfaction with the statue and with the proceedings of the day. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg, the brother of the deceased Prince, presented the sculptor, Mr. Brodie, to the Queen, who repeated to him the expressions of her appreciation of the statue, both as a work of art and as a faithful resemblance of the lamented Prince. The Royal party then, attended by the Lord Provost and magistrates, returned to the general station. At twenty minutes before eleven o'clock the Queen departed for Balmoral, which she reached at half-past four. She was greeted with hearty cheers on her way by a large assemblage of ladies and gentlemen at the Aberdeen station, where she was received by Sir Alexander Anderson, Lord Provost of the city, and other official persons.

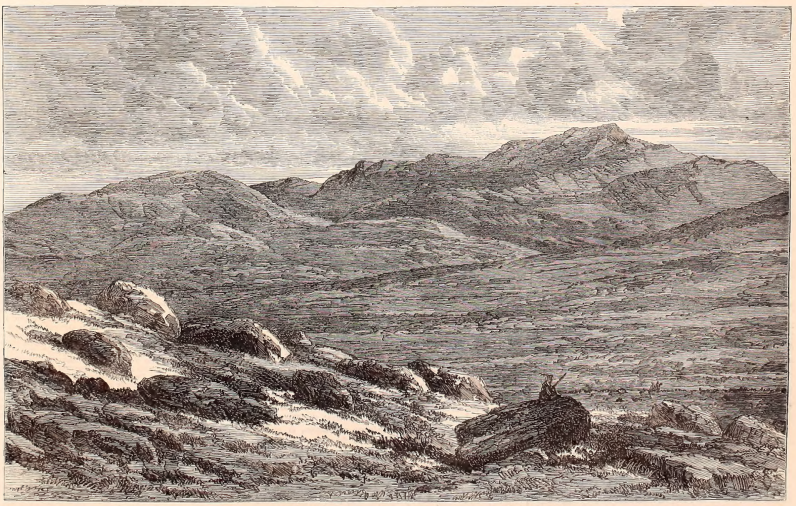
STATUE OF THE LATE PRINCE CONSORT AT PERTH, BY W. BRODIE, R.S.A.

THE PRINCE CONSORT'S CAIRN, FROM THE NORTH SIDE OF THE DEE, NEAR ABERGELDIE.



BRAEMAR, FROM THE GARDEN OF THE INVERCAULD ARMS.

VIEWS IN THE SCOTTISH HIGHLANDS NEAR BALMORAL.—THE BRAEMAR GATHERING.

We continue the series of our Illustrations of the scenery in the neighbourhood of Balmoral. The Engraving on page 256 gives a view of the cairn or monument of loose stones, erected to the memory of the late Prince Consort, on the top of a hill within the Royal demesne. The first stone was laid there by the Queen herself in the summer of 1862. Our view is taken from a spot on the other side of the river Dee, near Abergeldie.

The View of Braemar Castle, about nine miles from Balmoral, is taken from the garden of the Invercauld Arms, in the little village named Castleton of Braemar, the head-quarters of tourists in that picturesque region of the valley of the Dee. The "castle" is a high, bare-walled tower of recent erection. The deep, rocky ravine, fringed with copses, through which the turbulent stream of the Clunie dashes down to join the Dee with the distant mountains, for the most part green and wooded, which surround this place, make up a very effective scene. connection with this Illustration of the locality, we may remark that the annual Braemar gathering of the clans, for competition in various Highland sports and games, took place on Thursday week. The Prince and Princess of Wales, with several of the nobility, were present as spectators. There was a good muster of Highland plaids, the Fife men, some eighty in number, being commanded by Viscount Macduff, Mr. R. W. Duff, M.P., and Mr. George Lane Fox. The Farquharsons had a rather larger array, and were officered by Captain Farquharson, 60th Rifles, and Captain Henry Farquharson, Scots Fusilier Guards. Combined, they were a very fine body of men, and, dressed in the tartans of their respective chiefs and armed with long poles, had an imposing appearance. Unfortunately the weather was wretched, strong gusts of wind and drizzling showers sweeping down the valley. Notwithstanding this, the spectators gathered steadily around the ring, and the competitors stripped and set to work racing, "putting the stone," throwing the hammer, "tossing the caber," until the raising of the standard on the castle top announced the coming of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The games were instantly stopped, and the Highlanders, forming into line, greeted their Royal Highnesses with loud cheers, the general body of spectators joining heartily. The Prince and Princess were received by the Earl of Fife and Colonel Farquharson, of Invercauld. Her Royal Highness took her seat on a sofa beside Lady Fife, while the Prince entered into conversation with the gentlemen around. Among the company in front of the castle and overlooking the games were Lord and Lady Holmesdale, Lord Cowley, Lord Tyrone, Lady Blantyre, Lord Hamilton, Sir Charles Wood, General Hood, Major Teesdale, Dr. Sieveking, the Marquis of Huntly, Lord Bertram Gordon, and many persons of rank and station in the county of Perth. The games, having been renewed, were contested with great spirit for about an hour, when short cut took place, during which luncheon was served in the castle to a party of about one hundred. Colonel Farquharson had the honour to conduct the Princess of Wales to table, the Prince following with Miss Oswald, the Colonel's bride-elect, on his arm. This incident was at once noticed by the Highlanders, and seemed to give much gratification.

After luncheon the sports recommenced, and, despite the rain, which came on heaviest during the dancing, the Royal visitors seemed kept their places till the end, when they took tea in the castle, and shortly before six o'clock drove off for Abergeldie Castle, amidst enthusiastic cheers.

The hero of the games, alike for strength of arm and agility in jumping, was Donald Dinnie, well known as the champion of the "Deside Champion." James Paton Murthly carried off the prize of £5 given by the Prince of Wales to the best performer in the Highland dance; while Lady Fife's prize of a like sum, for dancing reels, fell to John Cumming Farland. Alexander Robertson Glenisla cleverly eclipsed all competitors for the sword dance, and Colonel Farquharson to the winner of the half-mile race. A grand ball was held in the evening at the castle, when a number of the neighbouring visitors named above joined the Highlanders in their merry-making. The arrangements for the gathering, under Mr. Brown, factor at Invercauld, were very complete and satisfactory.

The subject of our third Engraving is Loch-an-Gar, to which Byron has dedicated a few well-known verses. Here is a small black lake, which sleeps at the foot of a wide corrie or cleft near the summit of a mountain some miles to the south-east of Braemar. But in our View this lake, from which the mountain takes its name, is hidden by a lofty range of precipitous rocks, which run sheer down to the edge of the water, inclosing it with a wall of rock. The lake is a dark one, strewn with white crags or tors, slope upwards to the top of the mountain. The forest of Balmoyle, which lies just below this rocr antic solitude, is one of the best preserves of the red deer.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 10.

THE imparial observers of the affairs of America, who for our present purpose may be defined as those who desire to see peace re-established on constitutional basis, have recently perceived a gleam of hope in that direction. Without adopting too sanguine a view of the situation, it may at least be said that some things tend to show that there is a chance that negotiation will take the place of armed arbitrament, and that an attempt will be made to bring about a solution of the dispute between the North and the South. It has all along been well understood that Mr. Lincoln, in his character as President of the Federal States, was the representative of a war policy. He himself laid down his principle, in his own homely phrase, and probably with a sincere belief in the object of his policy, when form, when he said that all that was to be done, so far as he was to influence affairs, was to "keep pegging away." It was a very obvious deduction from this fact, that if the President were to receive the honour of re-election it would amount to a declaration to keep about the work in favour of a continuance of the war for another term of four years, or to the point of exhaustion on both sides, if that point should be reached within a less period than that to which the next tenure of the presidential office would extend. A proposition, therefore, which has for its object the withdrawal of the candidature of Mr. Lincoln, may be accepted as an indication of a change of opinion in the North, or in that portion of the people of the North who are practically the governing class. Few of us in this country exactly understand the force of certain political influences in America; but of late we have been led to suppose that the nomination of a candidate for the office of President at a convention to be held at Chicago was to be conclusive of the principles on which the coming election was to be conducted. It appears that the decision which is likely to be come to by this body is a rejection of the claims of Mr. Lincoln, and the nomination of a person who represents the opinions of the party which under the name of Democrat, while holding fast by the principles of constitutional liberty, just now prevalent, the see that object attained by peaceful means, and therefore is in favour of at least a suspension of the war. In this country a declaration of a political league, even at Manchester, could not summarily decide a great national question; but, according to opinions and statements which just now prevalent, the vote of the Chicago convention will go far to turn the tide of sentiment in the North towards peace, and it is said that Americans are embracing the new policy of negotiation almost as eagerly as they adopted that of war.

However all this may be premature, it is not to be supposed that the Federals have yet yielded, even in idea, the question of Southern independence or have given up all hope of the restoration of the Union. The utmost that it can be assumed that they have ceded is that event may be left to be worked out by the ordinary course of hostilities, and that the side pending an effort at negotiation, without prejudice to another and future appeal to arms. Without taking for granted—for the fact is one by no means to be assumed—that the North is actuated by any notion of proximate exhaustion, it may be supposed that a cessation of the flow of blood and treasure which has been going on so long would not be unwelcome to the Federals; and, looking to the military situation, an armistice would by no means operate to the ultimate detriment of the North with reference to any renewal of hostilities. It is possible—indeed, probable—that a temporary lull in the storm of battle is all that will issue out of negotiations. If the South should refuse to re-enter the Union upon any terms, it is very questionable whether the North would submit to acknowledge secession; and the only alternative would be a recurrence to the attitude of belligerents.

While admitting a doubt of a favourable result arising out of the new phase into which the question of North and South is presumed to have entered, we, who have uniformly urged peace and a restoration of at least the outward and visible signs of peace and goodwill between those who are brethren by nationality, if not wholly by race, cannot fail to state our earnest desire that there is truth in the rumours to which we have referred of a tendency towards a policy of negotiation in America. We are aware that on the whole of this contest that we have seen any signs of the coming of the rainbow through the clouds of broil and battle; and most heartily shall we hail its appearance. If there exist amongst the Federal party the sagacity which is at this moment attributed to them, and which leads them to see that a combination of circumstances which are sufficiently obvious, but which it is not necessary to wound Northern susceptibilities by specifying, have arisen, which gives fair opportunity for putting a stop to the effusion of kindred blood, we trust it may not be exercised in vain. The Americans are a people actuated by impulse as by any other motive, and if now they are yielding to an impulse which carries them towards an attempt to restore peace to their country, even the cynics of the world will forgive them any deficiency in dignity which may seem to attach to them because they have not been influenced by some high-wrought notion of abstract principle.

VISIT OF THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES TO DENMARK.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by Prince Victor and attended by Earl and Countess Spencer, Countess De Grey, Lieutenant-General Keating, Colonel Teesdale, and Commander the Hon. A. Duncan on Saturday last, on their voyage to Denmark, as described on page 274. They arrived at Elsinore in the Royal yacht Osborne, at ten o'clock on Tuesday morning, landed at one o'clock. The quay was decorated with festoons of flowers and evergreens, and flags of all nations, those of Great Britain and Denmark excepted. At the entrance to the principal street was a triumphal arch, bearing the word "Welcome," the initials "A. L." and the letters "A. E." and surmounted by a trophy of the Danish and English flags. At four o'clock in the morning a Danish man-of-war and her Majesty's steamship Ariadne were lying off the harbour, the former having two or twelve Danish men-of-war were anchored off the harbour. The King and Queen of Denmark and Princess Dagmar arrived in an open carriage and four a little after ten, and proceeded to the Castle of the Wort to await the arrival of the Prince and Princess. At twelve o'clock the guns announced the arrival of the fleet in the roads, a salute was fired by all the Danish ships, and the band of the 4th Regt. of Danish Infantry played "God save the Queen," as the Osborne steamed into the harbour. "Rule Britannia" followed, the observation on all sides being favourable. Nearly three quarters of an hour were occupied in bringing the steamer to her moorings, during which time the King, Queen, and Princess Dagmar proceeded on board to the Osborne, and remained on board, when the Danish standard was hoisted at the main. The band on board, previous to the landing, rendered the compliment of the military band on shore by playing "The Danish Hymn." The Prince of Wales first stepped across the gangway, which was covered with crimson cloth and strewed with flowers, the Queen of Denmark resting on his arm. The King of Denmark followed, with the Princess of Wales, and the most affectionate greeting and the kissing of a hundred cannon. The burgomaster of the town read an address, and the choral societies of the town sang "God Save the Queen," which had been translated into Danish for this occasion. The Royal party then withdrew to Denmark's Castle, where refreshments were served; and afterwards proceeded to Fredensborg, where the Prince and Princess will sojourn during their stay in Denmark.

Mr. J. G. Hubbard, M.P., has contributed the sum of £1000 towards the erection of the new church of Bonsdon.

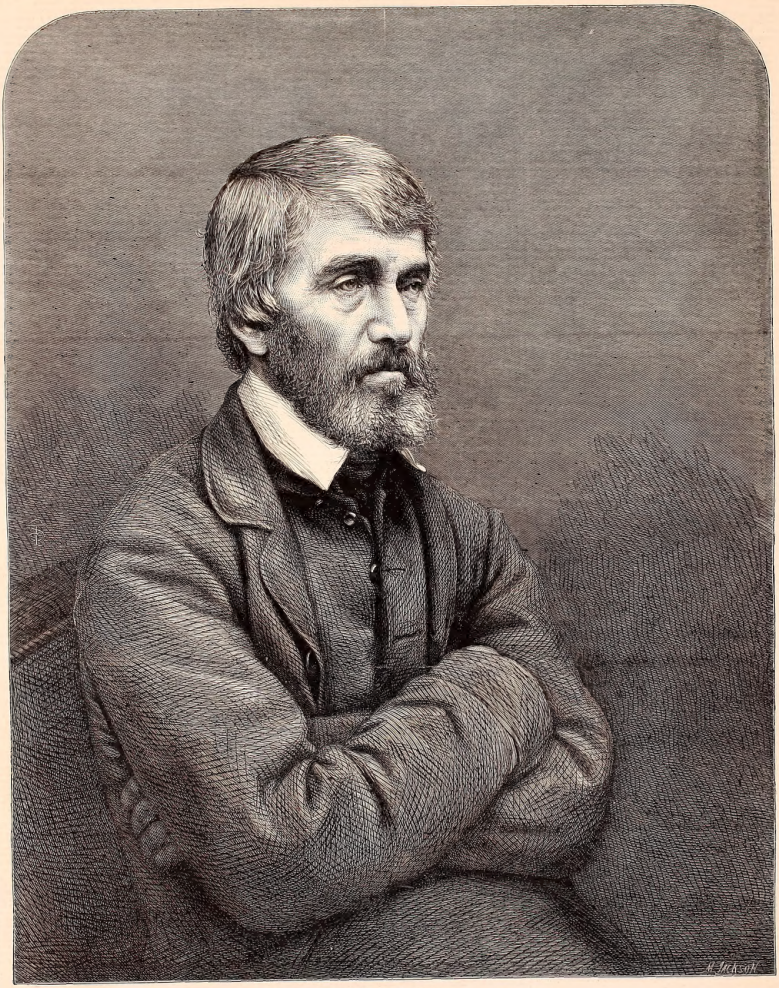
The Church of St. James, Bury St. Edmunds, which has been recently restored, under the direction of Mr. Gilbert Scott, was opened on Tuesday week, when there was a full choral service. The total outlay has been nearly £2000, while the total cost of the restoration is about £3000.

A scheme is said to have been submitted to the Secretary of State for India in Council for the subdivision of the existing Indian dioceses. The plan comprises the erection of three new sees, one for Bengal, one for the North West Provinces; one at Lahore, for the Punjaub; and one at Palamcotta, for the missionary province of Tinnevelly.

On Wednesday week the foundation-stone of a church, to be dedicated to St. Peter, was laid at Bishop's Tachbrook, near Leamington, by Lady Augusta Stanley, which will serve as a chapel-of-ease to Kirkella, the parish church being at that village. Sir Francis Legard gave the site for the building, which will cost about £1600.

Yesterday week, at six o'clock, the mortal remains of the Rev. W. Marsh, D.D., Vicar of Bedlington, Northumberland, and Honorary Canon of Worcester, were interred in Bedlington churchyard. A large number of clerical and lay friends and admirers followed the body to the grave, for which a select service was performed by the Rural Dean, assisted by the Rev. Canons Trevor and Gutteres. After the service at Whitley on Saturday a handsome drinking fountain, the gift of Mr. George Grey, Mayor of Newcastle, and Mr. Alan's Church, was inaugurated in that village by the Duchess of Northumberland.

The new chapel of St. John's College, Cambridge, which is being erected from the designs of Mr. Scott, R.A., is to receive an important alteration, from the likelihood of Mr. Henry Hoare, of Fleet-street, form ly a distinguished member of the college, having left a sum of money in trust for the purpose. It was suggested to Mr. Scott that a massive stone tower, as a substitute for the flèche, or wooden spire, would be a great improvement in the design of the building. Mr. Scott warmly espoused this idea, and prepared a design for a tower and spire, which he submitted to the college authorities, and which met with the second set of windows. The authorities of the college, however, finding that the proposed change would involve additional expenditure of between £3000 and £6000, decided that they could not in prudence adopt it, and resolved to proceed with the work originally contemplated. Mr. Henry Hoare has recently presented to the college to erect the tower at his own expense. The offer has been accepted, and the college, at his request, has made changes in the plan of the building have been begun.



A meeting has been held at Oxford, by the Rev. Dr. Pusey on the subject of the recent decision by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case of "Essays and Reviews." He says that, as to Mr. Wilson's case, "the Lord Chancellor did for those who trusted him, and not our Lord or His Church, what, amidst the belief in 'half' and that, as Dr. Wiseman's case, "there was a jubilee of triumph among half-believers, as if all barriers were thrown down, and disbelief might have its course." He says that the Privy Council history, he urges that the English Crown may stand in need of the aid of the Baptist Church, and the State may wish that it had not weakened her. Let Churchmen, he says, support no candidate for Parliament who will not pledge himself, as did a man in him to restore the Court of Ecclesiastical Causes, and besiege Parliament until it is reformed. It has been suggested that as by church rates are offered for conservation as many pence per £ on the building of churches which by consecration would become the property of the present Church of England, and, by some gifts and endowments, in perpetuity, until the present heresy-legalising court shall be modified. "This will show our rulers that we are in earnest." Such is the substance of the meeting.

The following extract from a letter from Mr. Wyllie, Ministerof Foreign Relations to the King of Hawaii, affords a gratifying proof of the correctness with which the present Government of those islands is now newly-established mission :—"Leaving Honolulu in the Royal yacht Kaluenana, the 17th inst., with a long and strong breeze, we passed Diamond Head at a rapid wind, which was blowing with the force of a gale, and a heavy sea running, covered the yacht with spray every time she struck. THOMAS CARLYLE.

MR. CARLYLE'S readers know Mr. Carlyle. Few writers have left a stronger impression of their own personality. His books are an emanation of his peculiar temperament and real idiosyncracy. They are, in this sense, among the most original of literary productions. By originality, we mean that they are the sincere and genuine expression of the author's whole mind; not that their matter is new. Most of Mr. Carlyle's doctrines are as old as the hills. They are coeval, as he might say, with "the Eternal Verities." They are, at least, as ancient as the Book of Job. Whether as an historian, biographer, or censor of contemporary affairs, Mr. Carlyle has the same arguments to set forth. These, divested of his modern applications, may be found in certain venerable maxims of essential morality and practical religion, of which the world perhaps needs to be reminded in his forcible and startling way. As a non-ecclesiastical preacher, he has formed to himself a pulpit from the study of modern history, German poetry, and the metaphysical theosophy of Fichte; but in the deeper soil of sacred antiquity are fixed the roots of his prophetic discourse. The result is a system of ethico-poetic spiritualism, which commends itself to the imaginations as much as to the sentiments and consciences of many readers. Mr. Carlyle is a man of genius; he is an earnest man; he throws his whole soul into the deliverance of these opinions, professedly as a Divine message, some thirty or thirty-five years ago. He gained an immense influence over young and ardent minds. It is the privilege of an author sometimes to impress his own intimate convictions, feelings, and habits of mind upon a large part of the rising generation. Mr. Carlyle's example and teaching have had their effect, which may be traced in many departments of social, political, religious, and literary progress. Philosophical Radicalism has certainly been modified by the influence of Mr. Carlyle. Administrative Reform, the Broad Church movement, and the general disposition to improve the condition of the labouring classes have received an impulse from him. We often find his views reflected in the speeches, sermons, essays, novels, and popular fictions of the day. Mr. Kingsley and Mr. Anthony Trollope, among others, have been more or less tinged with his complexion. The way in which a question like the extension of the suffrage, or an event like the civil war in America, is now regarded by an important section of the higher and middle classes in England is probably due, in some degree, to Mr. Carlyle. It is to be hoped that the influence of his writings has been still more efficient, and altogether more salutary, upon the private lives of a great number of his countrymen; that he has encouraged them to put aside the besetting sins of a luxurious and pretentious state of society, the vices of a selfish and cowardly indolence, wantonness, insincerity, and cant; that he has taught them the dignity of useful work, the sanctity of justice and truth; that he has inculcated, in one word, the fear of God. For this is the message that Mr. Carlyle undertook to deliver when he began to speak out what was in him. His earlier performances were those of a writer skilful in his craft, who had edited a collection of German fairy tales, compiled a slight "Life of Schiller," and translated the "Wilhelm Meister" of Goethe, besides occasional contributions to the magazines and reviews of that day.

The time when Mr. Carlyle fairly opened the oracle of his philosophy was just in the midst of that general ebullition of liberal sentiments, that sanguine exultation of bold and generous minds, which accompanied the Paris revolution of July and the subsequent passing of the English Reform Bill. In those years Mr. Carlyle conceived his "Sartor Resartus," which appeared in Fraser's Magazine somewhat later. We cannot speak more judicially of this extraordinary work of genius. It is, in our judgment, the work of greatest value to his literary fame: it is, moreover, that by which the vital and seminal principles of his system of thought were first communicated to the world. We do not underrate the brilliant imagination, the powerful eloquence, the vast knowledge and research displayed in his larger historical works; but in our appreciation of Mr. Carlyle's rank as a teacher of the age, we cannot deem them of equal importance with "Sartor Resartus," "Hero-Worship," and "Past and Present," which are the distinctive expression of his most characteristic doctrines.

It is a very significant feature in the literature of the nineteenth century, that some of its most influential and popular writers, laymen as they are, while shunning to intrude on the province of the orthodox theology, have treated, independently, the ideas and emotions which constitute "natural religion." In the last age there was a conventional reserve, if not a prevailing scepticism, which usually put to silence on such topics the most thoughtful persons not expressly called to expound the Evangelical creed. Even Akenyside's poem of "The Monuments," one of the noblest utterances of devotional feeling, would scarcely have been published as a religious poem, were it not a hymn-book, approved by godly ministers of some church or sect. Literature, in the present day, is more spiritual and free; and it would be if dared formerly to profess, does not shrink from claiming its right to discuss and illustrate that part of religious truth which belongs to the general mind of human speculation and thought. Mr. Carlyle, best in the austere faith of the Scottish Kirk, still cherishing his reverence for the Hebrew Bible "—deep as love, deep as life," as he once, in other words, "—and sharing much of Edward Irving's fiery zeal, has belonged unconnected to his pen to this service. In his public lectures of 1840 he avowedly adopted the maxim of Fichte, "That the true Man of Letters should be a Prophet or Priest, sent hither to discern and make known to its Presence of God manifested in every age and country." This is a very serious profession, and Mr. Carlyle is not a man to have assumed it lightly.

It would be shallow and unfair criticism which should omit to lay stress on the declared purpose of his literary career. That he has honestly and earnestly preached what he believed to be divine truth will not be denied by his candid opponents. His views are to be found in a treatise by Fichte, "On the Destination of Mankind," which is the logical exposition of them. That all things in the visible Universe, with outward and all other symbols, are but the vesture of the one sensuous Appearance, under which lies the sole Reality"—namely, the Idea of the Universe in the eternal mind of God; that Time and Space are but modes of our finite intellectual vision; that the Here and Where and When, though seemingly inseparable from all our thoughts, are but superficial conditions to thought; that we cannot conceive of God as dwelling in a universal Here, an everlasting Now, and look upon all Nature as the present which He wears to be seen of us—these notions which we will not attempt to discuss, form the basis of Carlyle's philosophical structure. His theory of Hero-Worship, to which we shall by-and-by advert, is a necessary result of it.

"Sartor Resartus," or "The Tailor Stitched Together," contains the abstract sense of what we have cited. In these words: but accompanied with a half-satirical development of the idea that the phenomena of our social life, the outward aspect, forms, and fashions of this world are the mere clothing of the human spirit, partial and decent while it lasts, but soon to be worn out and cast aside. The truth which is the kernel of this grotesque and humorous satire is compromised by the whimsical exaggeration of its bearings in the commentary of Herr Diogenes Teufelsdroch, Professor of Things in General at the University of Know-and-Care-Not, the inventor of a system of German recluse philosopher, with his vast erudition, his eccentric adventures, his sublime speculations and sodden ignorance of the commonest, indeed, is seldom so philanthropic or so pious. Swift, for example, with a giant's force, uses it like a cruel giant. Voltaire is much kinder. He takes the various scenes and shows of the world into his magic-lantern, and reduces their greatness and splendour to the thinnest shadow, but with a kind bless me! which forgives it as it is the temporary abode of human spirits. He thus makes a few remarks on the assorted passage of the Gods and mortals in succession, each swarming for a moment across the fields of time and space. "They are an Apparition of the Divine Idea. But if whence and whither? And O whither do they go? Sense knows not; Faith knows not; only that it is through Mystery to Mystery, from God and to God. This is the inscription of the universe of Time and of Thought. The author shifts from the profoundest passages of the soul's history—from the "Everlasting No," the "Pain and Indifference," and "Worship of Sorrow," and the "Everlasting Yea," to the gayest innocent words. Grotesque, recorded fun and wisdom of the most genial book, the moral energy which inspires its conception—and it is all in the capricious oddity of its details—are scarcely paralleled even in the Pantagruel of Rabelais, and altogether unapproached but by the author, by any other writer in ancient or modern times.

This composite style, by-the-way, had a singular effect on the literary habits of its author. The earlier writings of Mr. Carlyle—some of which we have named—were distinguished by their propriety and correctness of style, formed after the best English models. Indeed, in "Sartor Resartus," having to create for Diogenes Teufelsdroch a "singular, wild, outlandish, hyperpoetical style of his own," as he describes it, Mr. Carlyle, by his own admission, "lost much of the purity of his English," and acquired those reverberate peculiarities which, though he promised "by time and assiduous effort to correct them," have beset all his subsequent works. We think the result is very much to be deplored. It made his later writings almost always repulsive to many young readers who had not become accustomed to the quaint language which he employs. The jerking abruptness, the forced inversion of sentences, the plethoric fulness of diction, the copious introduction of German, French, and Scottish idioms and of home-made slang, the unconventional orthography, especially the abuse of adverbs and conjunctions, which he omits where they should be not inserted, are they should not, are characteristics of most of Mr. Carlyle's style. On the other hand, he commands a rich vocabulary: he can paint a picture or tell a story with the finest and strongest words. He is but too pointed and emphatic, fatiguing us by the rapidity of his strokes; and every page flames almost intolerably with the stern energy of his fiery genius.

Those qualities of Mr. Carlyle's writing, as well as the vigour of his dramatic imaginations and his graphic powers, are most conspicuous in his wild history of the great French Revolution. We doubt, indeed, whether any modern writer can surpass or imitate the force of that passage; for not only the style but the views of Mr. Carlyle on this subject will probably be found to differ considerably from those which now flatter the ear of the public. The history of the French time which he is now engaged, though it deals with a less attractive and exciting topic, is a work of no much greater importance, and was no more wanted to supply a great defect in our library of historical information, that it will long keep its place there.

We may, however, leave these more extensive literary undertakings, since their interest belongs rather to Frederick and to Mirabeau or Danton than to Mr. Carlyle. We cannot even stay to examine a more congenial work, his "Life of Cromwell." His memoir of John Sterling is a most interesting record of a private friendship. We must return to speak, very briefly, of the "Lectures on Heroes, Hero-Worship, and the Heroic in History," which mark the second stage of his system of moral and philosophical teaching. He enters here upon a course of thought in which many of his former disciples—we appeal to their own experience—have felt way of following him to the end. It was, perhaps, impossible that the high imaginative and nervous which had much employed him up to 1840, and by the interest of a few eminent personalities in the history of the French Revolution. We will not say the habit of extending great men had so grown upon him that he came to regard each of them as a special manifestation of "the Divine Idea of the World," instead of a favourable human example of the general capacities of their race. He asserted, on the contrary, that "to make a hero there must be a god-created soul which will be true to its origin," and that the Puritan spirit in seventeenth century were "a nation of heroes." But in magnifying the excellence of a number of individuals, every one of whom, for instance, Rousseau, Burns, and Napoleon, had little of that Puritan quality of character, Mr. Carlyle was obliged to call for any exhibition of mental energy combined with "a certain distinctive honesty and sincerity," or with "a certain sincerity, sincerity," the full honours of hero-worship. Now, though we should admire strength of intellect and of will for their own sake, apart from moral worth, we must deplore that such qualities, special token of the presence of divinity in a big, but man, except in the old Greek sense of a favoured divine workman, are by no means all great men—that is, men showing natural abilities have done great things—even when admirable, as they rarely are, in other and, or small, we owe our reverence and love. Such men are not always great, and good, and wise, our obedience and submission. Of these distinctions, so far as we understand Mr. Carlyle, he is generally too unobservant.

In bringing this review of Mr. Carlyle's literary career to a termination, we regret to part with him on a topic where his views always so widely from our own. It would have been more satisfactory if we could agree with him in his overall happy opinion of which may be ranked next after "Sartor Resartus" and "Hero-Worship," as a direct and deliberate exposition of his principles, "Past and Present." "Past and Present." This volume, with his essay entitled "Chartism," and his "Latter-Day Pamphlets," form a class which neither from a corollary to "Past and Present," may be taken as the whole system of his political opinions on social and political reform. There are considerable merits in all these publications, merely as a literary production; but they do not does the author more strongly exert his tremendous powers of satire, of fierce invective, of denunciation of the abuses of the unrighteous rule of Abbot Samson in the Monastery of Bury St. Edmunds, in the twelfth century, with the manners and institutions of the mediæval period; while the character of the Abbot himself is drawn with a kindly and as vividly portrayed. Here, indeed, we meet with a true Hero—a great man who is also a good man, in the full sense of the words. It must be said, that Mr. Carlyle has the heartiest sympathy. This is the ground of his admiration for Cromwell. It is with this feeling, we are sure, that he has so often lifted up his voice against the cruel and sarcastic reproach against the vices and vanities of the age. He has done so in the most vehement manner in his pamphlet on the Negro servile allayed, which vexed him when he wrote of "the Coalition-of-Stupid question," and "the Parliament of Dilettanti," the landed aristocracy, our manufacturing and commercial aristocracy, and the whole writing, have been aroused to take an active share in public and private efforts for the relief of the distressed. He is legislation has been mainly directed to this object. Popular education has been extended, and the necessity for emigration, of which he likewise spoke in 1841, has ceased to be felt. With so great a change for the better, effected within the memory of middle-aged men, we may hope for a still greater improvement. We should not, however, be sorry if the generation we helped in our youth to bring about the moral reform so much needed in our own day.

The Portrait we have this week engraved is the best likeness of Mr. Carlyle which has been published. It is taken from a photograph by Mr. W. Jeffrey, of Great Russell-street.

MUSIC.

THE Birmingham Musical Festival—the greatest of all our provincial music-meetings—has been held during this week, in Bingley Hall, every morning and evening, and on Friday evening. Next week we shall give an account of the morning and evening performances, and of the production of the new cantata, which we may inform our readers that this has been one of the most brilliant, as from a financial point of view, most successful, meetings that have taken place since the beginning, in 1768, of the series. The new cantata, "Naaman," which was performed for the first time on Thursday evening, is the work of Mr. Costa, and is a setting of a libretto compiled for the purpose by Mr. Bache, of Dunkerton," standard work of the class to which it belongs. During the week Birmingham has been visited by Mr. Sims Reeves, who sang in the performance of Costa's oratorio was honoured with the presence of his Royal Highness the Prince Consort.

At the Gallery of Illustration, in Regent-street, Mr. German Reed has brought out a new operetta, composed by Mr. Balfe, entitled "The Sleeping Queen," which contains very pleasing and graceful music. The performers, as in Mr. Macfarren's operetta of "Jessie Lea," are Mr. and Mrs. German Reed. Miss Dolre Fulkyson has the principal part; the other parts devolve upon Mr. Corney Grain and Mr. R. Wilkinson. An amusing little piece, adapted from the French, in which Mr. and Mrs. German Reed, Miss Fulkyson, and Mr. Corney Grain, for the favour of the village bells, forms the concluding portion of the entertainment. Mr. Arthur Cecil, A. Shaw, who personates the blacksmith, is very droll indeed.

THE THEATRES.

THE winter dramatic season has now commenced, and we shall have to chronicle the opening nights of a host of theatrical entertainments. The transpontine houses take the lead. Astley's, reopened last Anderson, at the Surrey, on Saturday, again made a public demonstration of its popularity. A full force of the company was evident in their proceedings. The house, re-embellished and somewhat modified in its interior, looked fresher and more inviting. Extra convenience, too, were furnished—the public are treated to more room than they had in the old days—and the pit, in which we drop some, presenting Stratford-on-Avon, the medallion of Shakspeare, has been painted by Mr. John Johnson. The patrons of the establishment filled it full force on the opening night, and the house was crowded with an audience willing to admire. The performances commenced with "The Sailor's Return," a drama, entitled "The Happy Man." The hero, Paddy Murphy, whose shirt-front contributes so much to the happiness of the Sultana, was well performed by an actor new to the London stage, but who has won fame on the Dublin boards—Mr. W. Henry Montgomery. He was pleasingly welcomed by Miss Fanny Huddart, who, as Kate Kearney, showed to some special qualification as a singer. Mr. Wilkins's drama of "Civilisation," and Mr. James Rice's modified title of "The Savage and Civilisation;" and Mr. James Rice's modified title of "The Savage and Civilisation;" and Mr. James Rice's modified title of "The Savage and Civilisation;"

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE Warwick Autumn Meeting of 1864 opened more auspiciously than those of recent years. There has been something of an undefinable character which has operated against the popularity of the gathering for several anniversaries; and the enterprising lessee and handicapper, having doubtless seen that he laboured under some unfavoured influence, pulled himself together before it was too late, and not only saved the autumn meeting from the low stage to which it threatened to come, but actually made it on the present occasion a success. Warwick and Doncaster stand in the same parallel in the betting world as Bath and Epsom. It is, indeed, the exception when some favourite is not knocked out or a rank outsider brought to a short price for the Derby on Lansdowne. What racing man does not recollect the furore which Trumpeter created in 1859? And memory serves him equally well in bringing back to view the elongated visages of the victims of the "Bogus" telegram about Dictator's breakdown the following year, when the excitement on the Swindon platform was so great that Bookmaker Bill actually ignored the soup and peppered Robert's bore instead. But they burnt their fingers just one well-known Jewish firm of commissioners suffered so seriously from "mulk fever" that, in some quarters, their "getting round" was considered wonderful. The Marquis of Hastings' success in the Leamington Stakes with Redcap was another highly notable issue. According to present appearances and market operations, the first and second in the Derby are likely to have it all to themselves on the turn of the year, so we will say no more about the odds the verdict of the judge, and merely give the probable list of starters and prices as follows:—

Horse.	Jockey.	Horse.	Jockey.
General Peel ..	T. Aldcroft.	Vampisher ..	Norman.
Blair Athol ..	Challoner.	Windham ..	Crawshaw.
Minor	J. Osborne.	Thurtell ..	J. Gaster.
Buraglah ..	Ashmall.	Ackworth ..	S. Rogers.
Ely	Hollyhoe.	Hollyhoe ..	W. Boyce.
Master Richard ..	Deacon.	Gondola ..	Snowden.
Knight of Malvern ..	Fordham.	Ion	Lynch.
Cambuscan	A. Edwards.	Valiant ..	Morris.
Brece	Wells.	Hadrian ..	S. Adams.
Free	E. Sharp.	Brindisi ..	F. Adams.

Claremont having been so unequivocally knocked out of the betting at Tadcaster, on Monday, the starting is reduced to the above dozen, and Mr. Dewes will, therefore, trust to Baragah. Each Doncaster Septenber Meeting outdoes its predecessor in the value of the stakes, and the amount of the receipts on the Grand Stand, and the general interest and enthusiasm about the Derby of the north. From all appearances the importance of the meeting is about to be increased to a fully equal, if not eclipse, that of all previous years: for all Yorkshire, to say nothing of the other counties, is determined, if possible, to see "Leger." The annual sale of blood stock will be, as usual, a conspicuous feature; and the Messrs. Tattersall will, no doubt, be on hand sure to attract all the buyers throughout the kingdom. Buckstone, for whom the enormous sum of 4500 guineas was given last year, died recently in China. Redcliffe is now the favourite stand against a climate.

While the deerstalkers are busy on the hills in the forests of the North the tufters and harbourers are slotting their deer into the Somerset and Devon covers for some of those stirring bursts in the open, for description of which Mr. Karslake, Q.C., is the revered author of the late Dr. Collyns's work on Exmoor staghunting), has proved himself such a Nimrod. On the 30th, the hounds met at Hawkridge Wood, in the Dulverton country, held one of the oldest and best coops that has been reserved for the last few years in the county, and a hard run over the heather and fern covered hills, "where the boys are made up and the blackcock is bred," ended with a kill. Changing the venue to the North Devon, we hear that Mr. Wallace Heath has had a capital day on the South Esk with his pack (one of which, an Ilminster lurcher, did especially good service), the Welsh terriers, and killed a 22-lb. otter. Dr. Grant, the master of the Teviotdale, was on the Jed last Tuesday, but did not hit on the right line till he had driven from Camptown within four miles above Jedburgh. A beautiful bit of cold hunting ensued, in which Malakhoff, the old white hound from Dumfriesshire, Ringwood—the Lightfoot of the pack"—and the pioneering young Belman distinguished themselves greatly. They just held the line, which was fully three hours old, and yet scarcely dared to speak to it, for nearly half a mile, in the water, then on the bank, up a meadow and then back to the stream, where they marked him into a burrow under a tree-root which had only one hole-hole. He punished two of the hounds slightly when they first touched him; but when the terriers had driven him out to the ordenly changed his tactics, and retreated so far into the bank that Teddy and the terrier contingent could not dislodge him, and he was left for another day. The Doctor trusts, with the permission of the proprietor, to give a public day on the Teviot, the Jed, and the Ale, and these last his 9th season, during which he has had to kill fifteen otters.

A rowing match for £400 came off on the Tyne on Monday and Tuesday between Chambers (champion of the Thames) and Cooper, another famous sculler. On the first day Chambers was obliged to give up through Cooper having fouled him and knocked a hole in his boat. Chambers claimed the race as his, but the referee decided that both should row again. Accordingly they started on Tuesday, and he was when Chambers won by 200 yards.

A swimming race for the female champion's cup took place in the Thames, from Hammersmith to Putney, on Monday evening. There were five competitors, the youngest and smallest of whom, named Henry Kyes, won easily. The youthful champion was pressed at an aquatic entertainment given by the London Swimming Club at the Metropolitan Bath on the following evening, when he won the two principal prizes.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

NOTWITHSTANDING the continued large supply of money on offer in the ground discount market, and that the demand for gold does not appear to be very urgent, the Bank of England has not reduced the rate of interest for more than 2 per cent. This has taken place in the quotations. Some of the dealers attribute the decline to the prospect of peace; in America and Mexico; but the more general opinion is that the Bank Directors have come to the conclusion that the present rate of discount is sufficient to induce capitalists to invest in certain joint-stock companies many of which are now being brought out.

On Thursday last the Bank of England rate of discount was reduced from 8 to 6 per cent. On the next market the best paper is now done as follows:—

Three months' bills ..	6 per cent.	Four months' bills ..	6 per cent.
Sixty days' bills	5½ ,,	Six months' bills ..	6 ,,
Short mercantile bills ..	6 ,,

Throughout the Continental money has ruled about stationary in price. We annex the exchanges on the leading places:—

The imports of bullion have been to a very moderate amount; but a few parcels of gold have been sent into the Bank of England.

The harbour master's return shows a movement of 1 to 1½ per cent.

On Saturday the market was very dull, and a considerable fall took place in the value of money.

A BARKING CARRIER COLLECTING FISH FROM THE TRAWL FLEET ON THE DOGGERBANK.

accordingly pile their packages on board, until it sometimes becomes absolutely dangerous. It is a stirring incident of this kind that is depicted in the foreground of our Engraving. As fast as the hands can work the boxes and baskets are struck down into the hold and stowed in tiers, between each pair of which a layer of ice is placed to preserve the fish in good condition, each carrier taking out with her eighteen tons of ice for that purpose. They will stow, on an average, about forty tons of fish, or from 500 to 1000 packages.

As fast as one carrier leaves another ceases fishing and takes her place. The general passage occupies about three days; but it sometimes happens that heavy weather during the winter months, and calms and variable winds in summer, interfere much with the regular delivery of the fish. It is this irregularity of communication that causes the great drawback to an increased supply to our markets. As an instance, we may mention that, about three weeks since, five days elapsed without a single carrier being able to get up to Billingsgate. The consequence of this is that the cargoes of fish are greatly deteriorated in value, while the scarcity raises the price and imposes much hardship and inconvenience both on sellers and consumers. Although Messrs. Hewett have spared no expense in towing their vessels sometimes upwards of one hundred miles to the market, this great difficulty has hitherto been insurmountable. We perceive, however, that a new element is about to be introduced into the business. A new limited liability joint-stock company has purchased the entire fishing fleet, with the stations, plant, goodwill, and connection of Messrs. Hewett; and a most important feature in its plan of operations is the introduction of fast and powerful steamers as carriers instead of the present sailing-cutters. Upwards of eighty of the principal factors, salesmen, and retail dealers have expressed their opinion that this plan will have the effect of creating a most beneficial revolution in our fish markets. At present, they state, the supply does not half equal the demand of the London market alone; but if once regularity, facility, and increased accommodation of transit are secured by means of the steam-carriers, abundance of fish, in splendid condition, can be delivered daily, at prices suitable to the means of all, and still highly remunerative to the trade. The new steamers will carry three times the cargo of any sailing carrier, deliver it in one third of the time, and as fresh as when taken. No matter what quantity they bring, there are purchasers for it all.

It appears that there are several most valuable banks, teeming with prime fish, which the fishermen are at present unable to touch, from the impossibility of getting cargoes home in a marketable condition. The principal of these lie along the Dutch coast, extending from the Island of Ameland to Helgoland. The Dogger Bank is not half fished, and to the north of it lie the splendid banks of the North-West Flat, Great Fishers' Bank, Fishers' Gut, &c., extending from 55 deg. to 57 deg. 15 min. north latitude; these have never yet been worked. But the fishing-ground which it is most desirable to reach will be that vast tract of sea lying opposite to Lyit Land, where enormous shoals of turbot, soles, brill, haddock, and plaice abound. Small boats from Blankenese, on the River Elbe, occasionally fish those grounds at a short distance from the land, and fill up full cargoes of prime fish in a single night. The English fishing fleet has heretofore been prevented working these prolific banks, owing to the strong east-going tide that sets along the Dutch land, which, together with the prevalence of westerly winds in summer, precludes the possibility of getting cargoes to the London market by sailing-carriers. By means of the steam-carriers of the new company it is expected this difficulty will be overcome, and an immense increase of supply very soon obtained. The Messrs. Hewett themselves, to show their confidence as practical men in the success of these operations, have taken £40,000 worth of shares in the company. Mr. Robert Hewett, indeed, gives it his services as managing director and general superintendent of the fisheries. As the prosperity of our fisheries is a subject of national importance, which has often engaged the attention of the British Legislature, we look with much interest upon this scheme for their extension and improvement.

THE WATERWORKS AT MENILMONTANT FOR THE SUPPLY OF PARIS.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great sanitary improvements in Paris of late years, an increased supply of good water is still a desideratum, that drawn from the river Seine having become, from various causes, more or less polluted, and water not being obtainable in the upper stories of Parisian houses. Both these inconveniences will shortly cease by the introduction into Paris of a vast quantity of pure water, obtained from a considerable distance, and to be distributed from two immense reservoirs established within the limits of the city; one at Menilmontant, for the supply of the ordinary Parisian levels, and the other at Belleville, for the supply of the more elevated districts in that quarter. The water destined for the Belleville reservoir will be pumped up by immense steam-engines in course of construction for that purpose.

Our Engraving represents the present condition of the works at Menilmontant for the execution of the more important reservoir, which, together with that of Belleville, will be alimented by the waters obtained from the rivers Dhuis and Marne, both celebrated for their pure and hygienic qualities, in order to ensure which with still greater certainty an immense aqueduct, from the source of the river Dhuis to Paris, has been constructed under the direction of one of the most competent of French engineers, to whom we are indebted for the following information as to its extent and capacities.

The entire length of the aqueduct for conveying the waters from the springs of the river Dhuis to Paris is 134 kilometres.* This immense work has been constructed partl in cast iron and partly in masonry. The portion executed in cast iron constitutes 16 kilometres, while that executed in masonry is 118 kilometres long, of which 10 kilometres are subterranean and 108 open, the water being carried through trenches of from three to seven metres in depth.

The parts of the aqueduct composed of cast-iron tubes of one metre interior diameter are met with in the spots where hills had to be passed through; those in masonry on the flat ground, or around hill sides. The aqueduct has an incline of but one tenth of a millimetre per metre, and is of an ovoid form. The masonry, composed of stone and cement, is twenty centimetres in thickness, and the roof of the vault is covered with a coat of cement two centimetres thick; moreover, all the interior is guaranteed by a covering in cement, so as to render the masonry altogether impermeable.

The lengths of the subterranean portions of this aqueduct vary from 200 to 2000 metres, and they have been constructed by means of wells of from 10 to 50 metres in depth. For the construction of the masonry and the artistic works connected with this great undertaking, 36 millions of kilogrammes of cement, 160,000 cubic metres of stone, and 88,000 cubic metres of sand have been employed; and the quantity of earth displaced for the passage of the aqueduct amounts to 850,000 cubic metres. For the metal tubes, 10,000,000 kilogrammes of cast iron and 140,000 kilogrammes of lead have been required.

The free channel and the forced, or metal channel, traverses, by means of twenty-eight small bridges, the numerous watercourses met with in its route; three similar bridges, or ponteaux, as they are called, have been employed for crossing different portions of the Eastern Railway. The most important of these bridges is that over the Marne, near the village of Dampmart, five kilometres from Lagny; it consists of three arches, the middle one spanning 27 metres, and the two others 22½ metres each. The beauty and the boldness of this fine work of art consist in its arches being only 3 metres in width for a bearing of 27 metres, the arches themselves forming a semi-ellipse, raised, at the keystone, 9 metres above the average height of the waters of the river Marne.

We terminate these necessarily untechnical details respecting this interesting aqueduct by the most important statement as to its capacities, which will enable it to deliver into the city of Paris 12,000,000 gallons of pure water daily, or nearly 140 gallons per second!

* In order not to confuse the engineer's figures we have preserved the French weights and measures. The kilometre is 1000 metres, of which 1609 go to an English mile; the metre, 100 centimetres, of which 91½ constitute a yard; and the millimetre is one tenth of a centimetre. The kilogramme is a little over two pounds.

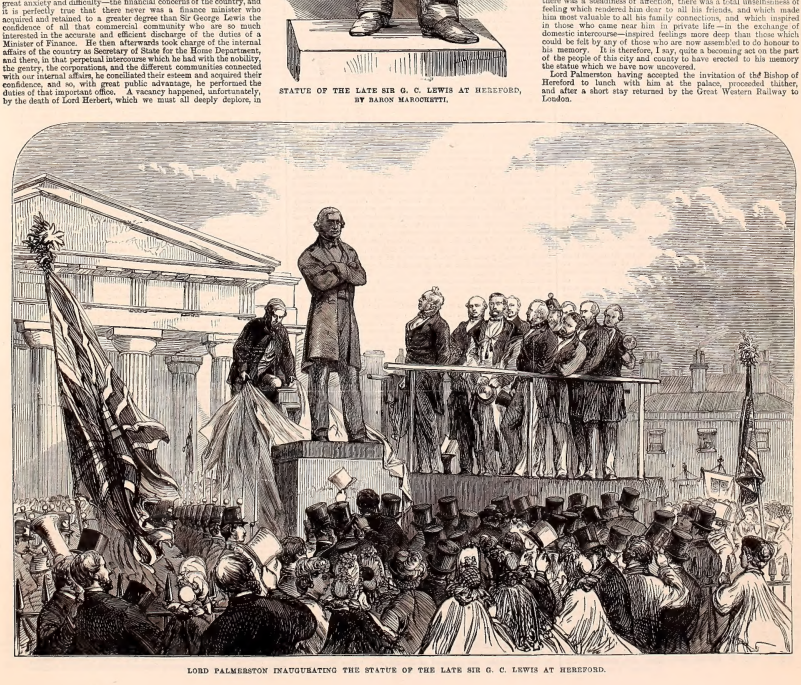
INAUGURATION BY LORD PALMERSTON OF THE STATUE OF SIR G. C. LEWIS AT HEREFORD.

THE inhabitants of the city and county of Hereford having subscribed for a statue of the late Sir George Cornewall Lewis, their neighbour and former representative, Baron Marochetti has executed the work, and Lord Palmerston visited Hereford on the occasion of its public inauguration last Saturday. The artist of this statue has produced a striking likeness of Sir George, who is represented standing with his arms folded, as if in the act of addressing a public assembly; and his dress is not that of an ancient classical orator or statesman, but the plain frock-coat and trousers worn by an English gentleman—a costume which, if it in any degree impairs artistic effect, has, at least, the merit of truthfulness. The figure is cast in bronze, and is 7ft. 6in. high. The plinth which supports it consists of a block of unpolished Penrhyn granite, upon which rests a moulded polished pedestal; the total height of the memorial being 14ft. On the pedestal there is this appropriate inscription:—"Sir George Cornewall Lewis, a learned and honest statesman, a profound scholar, a kind and firm friend; M.P. for the county of Hereford from 1847 to 1852; chief steward of the city; Chancellor of the Exchequer from 1855 to 1858; Home Secretary from 1859 to 1860; Secretary for War from 1860 to 1863. Born, 1806; died, 1863."



Lord Palmerston, who had arrived on the Friday evening, and was, for that night, the guest of the Rev. Archer Clive, at Whitfield, came into the town about noon. The streets were full of people; the windows were decorated with flags, laurels, and inscriptions; the militia and volunteers, with their bands of music, attended in force. Lord Palmerston was accompanied by Earl Somers and Colonel Felden in the carriage which brought him to the Wye Bridge, where he was received by the Mayor, Aldermen, and Corporation. A procession was formed, in which the Odd Fellows' and Foresters' lodges bore a conspicuous part. In St. Peter's-square a platform had been erected for the accommodation of the noble Viscount, the gentry of the county, and the municipal authorities. Among those present were the Bishop of Hereford; Lieutenant-Colonel Felden, High Sheriff of the county, and Mrs. Felden; the Rev. A. Clive, High Steward of the city; E. Patershall, Esq., Mayor of the city; Colonel Clifford, M.P.; Alderman Bodenham, Mr. C. Wren Hoskins, Lord and Lady Saye and Sele, Sir Gilbert Lewis, Sir P. Cornewall, Mr. King, Lady Emily Foley, Lady Langdale, and others. An immense crowd was assembled within a short distance, by whom the noble Viscount was most enthusiastically cheered. At the entrance of the Shirehall an address was read on behalf of the city authorities, to which Lord Palmerston briefly replied. The Rev. Mr. Clive then addressed his Lordship, inviting him to uncover the monument of his departed colleague, whose public and private virtues were justly and gracefully described in Mr. Clive's most appropriate speech. Lord Palmerston then drew aside the curtain which had hidden the statue from view, amid the deafening cheers of the multitude, the troops simultaneously presenting arms, salutes being also fired, and the militia band playing a slow and solemn march.

After speaking a few minutes to those near him, and expressing to them his opinion that the statue was an admirable likeness, Lord Palmerston addressed the meeting. There has seldom been, observed Lord Palmerston, any man in a great public career who so entitled himself to the esteem and admiration of his fellow-countrymen as the late Sir George Lewis. I may say that the whole active part of his life was devoted, in one way or another, to the service of his country. During the latter period of his life he filled some of the most arduous and important offices of the State. He was at one time Chancellor of the Exchequer. He managed during the Crimean War—a period of great anxiety and difficulty—the financial concerns of the country, and it is perfectly true that there never was a finance minister who acquired and retained to a greater degree than Sir George Lewis the confidence of all that commercial community who are so much interested in the accurate and efficient discharge of the duties of a Minister of Finance. He then afterwards took charge of the internal affairs of the country as Secretary of State for the Home Department, and there, in that perpetual intercourse which he had with the nobility, the gentry, the corporations, and the different communities connected with our internal affairs, he conciliated their esteem and acquired their confidence, and so, with great public advantage, he performed the duties of that important office. A vacancy happened, unfortunately, by the death of Lord Herbert, which we must all deeply deplore, in the office of Minister for the War Department, and Sir George Lewis—not according to his own inclination, because he would have preferred to remain in the office which he occupied, but at the earnest request of myself and others connected with the Government—undertook those more arduous duties, which he admirably performed. I cannot charge myself with the belief that, however heavy the pressure of those duties was, it did tend, in any degree, to shorten his valuable life. In all those great and important public offices he performed his duties in a manner which attracted the respect, esteem, and approbation of all concerned with the several departments; and he showed a versatility of talent which, perhaps, few men in an equal degree possessed. In his Parliamentary labours he was an able and efficient debater; he stood up manfully against all opponents in defence of his own opinions, but with a calmness and forbearance, and coolness of logical argument, by which, although he convinced many who had differed from him previously in opinion, and though he confuted his political antagonists, he never, even in the warmth of debate, made a personal political adversary. All those who know in any sphere of life how much the passions are apt to be excited by finding opinions adverse to their own supported by able antagonists, and how much the human mind is impatient of contradiction, must know what a fund of good nature, of calm forbearance, and of substantial reasoning there must have been in that mind which could pass through debates in the House of Commons, night after night and year after year, repelling attacks on some occasions, urging opinions on others; and yet, though distinguished as an able speaker in that house, never, by any lapse or yielding to any impulse, converting a political antagonist into a personal enemy. But, not only was Sir George Lewis most distinguished as a public man, but he contrived in a way which excited not only admiration but astonishment to those who knew him—he contrived, while he was engaged almost all the active part of his life in public duties of greater or less importance, all requiring a great devotion and time—he contrived to acquire a more varied, and more extensive, and deeper knowledge of all kinds than has often fallen to the lot even of those who had nothing to do but to devote their minds to its acquisition. He was one of the most learned men in private life, as well as one of the most active in public duties. There is one here who can bear testimony that, however great was his acquisition of knowledge, there was, with all that, such an unpretending simpleness and simplicity of mind that there was no unnecessary display. Men might have passed hours in his society, and, unless the conversation turned by itself upon subjects with which he was much better acquainted than most of those with whom he could come in contact, they might have been ignorant, and might have gone away without knowing of that vast store of knowledge which he had heaped up in his active and most industrious mind. But that knowledge was not merely useful, as all intellectual acquisitions are; but the habit of mind which the acquisition of knowledge gave him enabled him better to perform those public duties with which from time to time he was charged. The great quality—I may say the leading quality—of his mind was thirsting after truth. His great object was to ascertain truth. He was not impatient of contradiction; he was not impatient of difference of opinion. His object was, by comparing his ideas and his opinions with those of others, whether living or deceased, whether in conversation or in books—his object was to get at truth and to ascertain the correctness or incorrectness of particular opinions. That quality he possessed in a greater degree than almost anybody whom I have had the good fortune to meet. It was that quality which endeared him as a public man to those with whom he had to enter into communion. But in his private relations of life there was a warmth of heart, there was a steadiness of affection, there was a total unselfishness of feeling which rendered him dear to all his friends, and which made him most valuable to all his family connections, and which inspired in those who came near him in private life—in the exchange of domestic intercourse—inspired feelings more deep than those which could be felt by any of those who now assembled to do honour to his memory. It is therefore, I say, quite a becoming act on the part of the people of this city and county to have erected to his memory the statue which we have now uncovered.

Lord Palmerston having accepted the invitation of the Bishop of Hereford to lunch with him at the palace, proceeded thither, and after a short stay returned by the Great Western Railway to London.

STATUE OF THE LATE SIR G. C. LEWIS AT HEREFORD, BY BARON MAROCHETTI.

LORD PALMERSTON INAUGURATING THE STATUE OF THE LATE SIR G. C. LEWIS AT HEREFORD.

THE FARM.

SIR CHARLES KNIGHTLEY has gone to his rest. Those who knew them both can call up many pleasant shades of difference, but in the exact cardinal points of character Sir Charles was to the Midlands what Sir Tatton was to Yorkshire—the honoured type of the cavalier who would have melted his last tankard for Church and King, who carried his place like home among his own ancestral oaks and his peasantry, and who was true in heart to the fine old regime of "a member for the country, a lord for the living and a fox for the family gentle decay, in the full enjoyment to the last of the quiet pleasures of home. Both lie in the same parish church within their own domain. Strange as it may seem, they had never met or even seen each other. But Sir Charles, along with Mr. Anthony Rowe, was one of the especial "worthies" in Sir Tatton's own room at Sledmere. One used thousands and Lincoln Cakes, the other hunters and shorthorns. One had bred Grey Momus, Skim, The Premier, and Lifeguardsman—the other—in these great days when "George Villiers" was stealing over the country in a way that was making the scarlet coats look mad, and won his spurs on the ex-races Benvolio and Sir Marinel, and ensured the Queen Mostyn's field. Nearly contemporary, was a Melton and "the cocked hat" among its choicest haunts of sporting, hospitality, and character. Of his hunters "Guide Post." Hunting was Sir Charles's earliest love. He knew every nook and corner in the vast Northamptonshire woodlands, as well as Charles King, his keen friend of a lumberman; and from the middle of July till the first week in May, at which time he was generally finishing up the season in the New Forest, he almost lived in the saddle. He was quite as much fox hunting as he was for riding, and no pressure of business could or jeided himself more on that rich chase vocabulary and knowledge of the work of hounds which is now pretty much a lost art—never out of a hundred of our hardest men. "Blame me! but I've seen him at the end of a run all blood and mud from his horse's shoulders in one of his lectures, "he would be with hounds to see "—in their work to the end of a truth he would face the stiffest bullfinch as gallantly as he did the stiffest "wood and most rotten rail" of the shoemakers of Northampton, with his "old cannon-ball" crest on his hat, from the Grammar School of The County of Northampton. He was secure of his county seat as long as he cared to stand, and he rather enjoyed their "Radical musick," and they, too, rather honoured the spirit of the old man, who could not help neither book nor hand. As far as hunting went, he and his cereal, Sir Charles Knightley, were on the same level of the position, and Sir Richard King from the Pytchley point of view. Charles seldom lacked one or two friends from his own side of the country to ride the pack at night and beguiled the way with sunny memories of the rose of the Midlands, from the instant that every "spring of posse bristled with motion" till they returned to their stalls. He knew the world often get a by-day together, and long after shorthorns and Leicesters were considered Lord Ducie's bear into his lair, and he did not forget how they once took out fifty couple in the snow, and the "old country" was "all wool."

It was to these happy Pytchesley days, when "the mornings afforded unmixed pleasure, and nectar crowned the night," that Sir Charles's memory reverted on the last day he was with his friends and loved them, the hits and the pedigrees of the chieftains of the pack, the length of their noses and whether they had been put up to a "candlestick auction" after a hard day, came vividly before him as he talked through the vista of nearly half a century. It was quite a family party, Colonel Alfred Knightley, Frank Harrison, and the indefatigable nurses. Hugo Meynell (now Meynell Ingram), Charles and Peter Allix, Osbaldeston, called "Squire," Mytton, Tom Assheton Smith, Sir David and James Baird, Lucas, Bruen, Tom Grosvenor, Roberts, Payne, Alington, Wynn Mellon, and with him mirth, fun, and revelry; F. Ponsonby, "more than all the rest," Lord Alvanley's bosom friend, Pointy, and Sir F. Salisbury, who made it a rule of his hunting life never to ride on Sunday, or to meet a man in Savile Swedes. You heard from him of the sayings and doings of John Warde, who was never one of the "pinks," of the sowing of the Orick cover, and of the sufferings of King from the "Quick Brush" of the late Lord Rivers, left an imperishable name in the Pytchesley country by making "Lucy Glover" "Lucy Glover" and "Lucy" was never got benighted and had to sleep with his hunter in a barn; how Sir Robert Lawley, who was as much at home with a mace in a "set to" buy Roberts's mare "of the Beau Brummellisms; of Sandy Gilliver, of Sir Charles Sebright's father and his beloved Woodman; of Billy Butler, the parson of Hinton, who had the "cheek" to ask that terror to hard-riding Oxonians; of the riding of the Brothers Hawkins; of Jem Bailey, though not in the Pytchesley country, and when he could raise a hunter on leger, began with a matrimonial agency that "married as many as 20 people." Of the Pytchesley Club Sir Charles was pretty nearly the last survivor, and at this moment we can only think of two that are left. "Some," as he wrote of it, "became rich, some became poor, some took to wives, some to wives, a general blight prevailed, and Pytchesley was no more." With all his merry days they might be said to have closed for he did not, like too many, frown upon the sport and do what he could to stop it. Foxes were always secure of a refuge round Fawsley; there was a fire pardon for geese and sweet young lambs, and as for the poor very vermin-traps were set on poles for fear of nasking three-legged ones. He did not like more than one annual M. F. H. dinner at Boodle's, or pendant cards, with that long, easy seat, on one of his favourite chairs, to see the Pytchesley draw Bodby Wood, and then The Duke's, and Mr. Drake's had been doing. We believe that, although in the eighty-third year, he did not miss a meet of Lord Stamford's hunters at Quorn; and if there was a good stud to be had at Fawsley during the season, you might see him in the long white coat, white pantaloons, or pumps (always worn in the evening "over before him), with his head rather sunk in his shoulders, and the dark satin stock, which proved slightly unequal, you the keenest spectator from some carriage or coign of vantage.

His love of horses was quite a passion to the last. He loved their life; but he stuck to them to the last, and he was wont to say that whenever he had more than a couple in his stable, the Bradfordian phrase, "the least bit select herd for dispersion." Only last year, when he was seventy-seven years in the Herdbook; and a report that Lord Derby had offered him a fabulous average caused the "yellow" in the pedigree volume to be clustered by anticipation "Baron Fawsley." He held his own in shorthorns to the last across country, and, trusting pretty much to his fine knowledge of form and symmetry, and his keen blood, he built up a type of cattle which for quality and milking powers were not to be surpassed, and which undoubtedly is those of his own backs. His sale on April 3, 1860, despite bad weather, was a great success, and the average which was £80 15. for seventy-seven lots, stood about fourth at the time on that historic beef-roll which is kept by the brothers Collings. Go where they might, the blood seemed to do good, and Mr. Allix and the dairy at the House Farm has had to provide for the Duke of Cambridge and Allix. Aylesby, Stirfton, Sarsden, Panton, Southcote, Artington, and countless other Shorthorn herds, can show some shape or another; and Jonas Webb, in the last summer of his life, when gout tortured him to the last inch, might just take the Baronet to walk by his side along the bull line at Battersea, and, pausing first at this animal or that, remind him how he had bought the dam in calf at the Fawsley sale, and so on to Sir Charles's son The Englishman, and the two splendid First Fruits, who had won the gold medal against all the bulls, old and young, at Battersea.

Royal Butterfly once more asserted his prerogative as the best bull in the yard at the Royal Lancashire meeting, which had only a middling anniversary at Lytham. Lady Tiptoft, judging the work for her speech to the shorthorn breeders at the Branches Park sale by "beating you all again" with her beautiful heifer Lady of Rosslea for the medal for the best female in the yard. In the bull class, Mr. Davies's Bicer, who was such a capital third to Perth and Foss at Newcastle, was cleverly beaten by Mr. Boulton's Royal Duke, who commanded a great deal of attention. Mr. Eastwood's Barmpton Butterfly and Jacobs Butterfly, which had been first and second at Lytham, were not even commended at the Craven meeting, where the Bess and second lots fell in their class on Mr. Drabble's Kent Cherry, bred by Mr. Hales, and Mr. Eastwood's Royal Butterfly's Pageant, Lady Tiptoft's Lady of Rosslea was again the head of the yearlings, and Mr. Eastwood's Rosette, the Royal prize cow at Carlisle in 1860, was first in her class, and helped to carry a pail to her owner the prize for the best at Ulverston to win the four. Royal Butterfly appeared again couple of challenge cups. Lady of Rosslea was the Queen of the yard once more, and her herd contained Perfume, Second to none, old heifer. Mr. Jefferson's Holly Bush, by Booth's Welcome Guest, headed the cow class; and that well-known local breeder, Dr. Dickinson, came first and second in the dairy class. Wensleydale got on to the Lancashire hills with Mr. Willis's Baron Crossley as its best bull, and Mr. Bruere's Vesper and Baron Booth Bess as its best cows; the former of them the best female in the yard. The Bath and West of England Society has not succeeded to have four classes for cows in its cattle sections; and it seems most probable that they will make that alteration at the next meeting at Taunton. Guile has been so ably advocated both in this and the Royal Society by Mr. Duckham.

The Royal Society's annual sale of Exmoor colts will take place this year at Bristol, on Thursday, Sept. 22, and will be the largest on a number, chiefly bays, and the greater part of them by Dr. Beevor's Bobby, who was sold for 300 guineas. Bessie was sold on Exmoor during the seasons of 1858-59. The query, "Where are the Exmoor ponies?" has been a perpetual source of annoyance to the farmer of Cockermouth" was wont to be to the mind as "What will they say at satisfactorily. They are all rising five years old, will be unusually large, and, although they have had to travel from Exmoor in its cattle sections; and it seems most probable that they will make that alteration at the next meeting at Taunton. Guile has been so ably advocated both in this and the Royal Society by Mr. Duckham.

They are all rising five years old, from Exmoor pony mares, and almost all from the hills where they have been bred, and 1000 ft. to 1200 ft. above the sea level. The sale is a highly characteristic one, and will be the jumping trials, which form one of its great features.

We have received the following note from Mr. Torr, of Aylesby Manor, Grimsby:—"Sir,—My attention has been called to your "The Farm," in your Journal of the 27th ult., in which it is stated that 'the Grafton Hunt Cup' was won by Mr. Sanderson's Lady Elizabeth in 1860. She "commended" ran from Stirling, which Mr. Torr, the only English rider who has ever won the Grand National on a Scotch horse. I most distinctly deny this. The only selection I made for the first in Scotland was in the year when the sheep of Mr. Simson, which won. I had never seen these rams before, and knew nothing of them or their owner."

THE MAGAZINES.

THE readers of the Cornhill have made a great acquisition in "Wives and Daughters," which is one of the most cheerful, agreeable, and readable stories now in course of publication. The characterisation is a striking contrast to its yokefellow "Margaret Denzil" in the two original parts of the new contributor. The characterisation is a striking contrast to its yokefellow "Margaret Denzil" in the two original parts of the new contributor. The "Squire" Hamley, "Mr. Preston" and Mrs. Gibson are the sole characters in one side, crime and sensation on the other. A reader who likes his humanity may be pressed with pleasure by those who never carried a gun in their lives. It is redolent of the country and pervaded by good sense and geniality. "German Professors" is entertaining reading, but scarcely conducive to comfortable digestion. "The Lovers of Ballycoolan" concludes with a wreck and a death-couple, as in the case of Margaret Denzil.

After all that has been written about the Schleswig-Holstein question how is it that nobody has explained those whom that question chiefly concerns—the Schleswig-Holsteiners." So one asks in the first number of Macmillan, and proceeds, in a very learned but very readable discussion, to explain. As regards the Schleswig-Holsteiners, they are the peninsula in question. It is certainly a gross mistake to suppose that the Schleswig-Holsteiners had embarked in the present dispute as a question as that on "Partridge-shooting." The writer is no mere partisan, and his disquisition may be perused

A sum of £100 will be paid to each of the selected competitors, to cover the expense of converting the 50 rifles in the possession of each of the competitors required.

The Royal Sovereign turret-ship has just taken her first cruise since her conversion to a turret-ship. She left Spithead on Saturday under a strong wind and a heavy head sea. When fairly in the mouth of the roughest water, her Captain (Commander Jervis) ordered the helm to be put hard over and tumbler about as she pleased, in order to test her turrets in as conclusive a manner as possible. It was found that the turrets, as well as the ship, answered to windward, and under these circumstances the turrets and guns were manœuvred, and the ship's course altered, in such a manner as to cause her to be seen the case in action with an enemy in the same position and under the same circumstances. It was found that the turrets were perfectly weatherly, and the guns could be handled with the same ease as in smooth water, except, of course, that a little more care was necessary in the use of the gun-tackles. The ship being still kept in her rolling position, the guns in the turrets were next trained nearly fore and aft, the vessel's head being put about sharply and up, and turrets and guns left to themselves, the ship rolling in an arc of 21 deg. As, however, everything remained perfectly workable, and it was found that the men could take hold of the winch handles, and set the turret revolving, or cause them as they pleased, without having any clinging sensation of the movement, this was deemed both by Captain Osborn and Captain Coles quite sufficient evidence of the seaworthiness of the turrets, and pronounced to be almost unfavourable conditions no could be met with, except in a gale of wind. The vessel answered every movement of her helm as quickly as a wherry could have done.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

The St. Margaret's company of the Queen's (Westminster) held their annual prize-meeting for the present year on the 1st, inst., at the butts of the range, Warwood-street, Caversham, when the following prizes were competed for. An All-Cornwall prize-meeting was held at St. Columb, Cornwall, on Monday week. The first prize, of £30, was won by Captain Tucker, 8th Devon; the second, of £20, by Lieutenant Hawkins, 1st Cornwall Artillery; and the third, by Gunner Fittock, 13th Devon Artillery. The total amounted given in prizes was £190.——The annual prize-meeting of the Bodmin Rifle Volunteers took place at the company's range, near St. Austell, on Thursday week. The whole challenge cup, presented by Mr. Hawkins, M.P., was won by Sergeant Jones, before it becomes his absolute property, was competed for. Private T. S. Coom was declared the winner of the first prize, which was won by him on five times for twelve months. The first of a series of money prizes, given by the Rhubbinard at the range of the 1st Devon corps, was won by Colour-Sergeant Private Dunn. A handsome eight-day timepiece, the best of several prizes given by the Rev. Mr. Collins, was won by Private Hutchings.

At the fourth annual prize-meeting of the 6th Hants (Gosport), the first, second, and third prizes of the first match (three silver cups presented by Captain Hall, R.N.) were won by Sergeant Bingham, Ensign Monday, and Private Compigne. The next prize, the gift of Captain Compigne, the commanding officer, was carried off by Colour-Sergeant Austin, R.M.A. The all-comers' prize was won by Sergeant Snape, 6th Hants.——The disbandment of the 16th Middlesex (Civil Service) Rifle Corps, which was first raised at Guildford last Easter Monday has been confirmed by Earl De Grey and Ripon. After a full examination, the 6th Surrey has been declared to be efficient as a battalion, and the first prize, £10 was gained by Sergeant George Deans. The ladies' prize, a silver cup, was won by Private Elmore, and the gold cup of Broderick's prizes was carried off by Corporal Grieve; but his place was disputed by protest on the ground of his being a non-commissioned officer. The prizes were given for speed and volley firing, and the first was gained by the first class shots. The Lieutenant-Colonel's prize Private Hicks won the most three times in the first piece, and in the concluding one gained, after shooting off a tie with Major Bodley, £10 returned.

RESTORATION OF THE CHOIR OF HEREFORD CATHEDRAL.

The annual festival of the Diocesan Choir of Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester having taken place this year at Hereford, from the Tuesday to the Friday of last week, we consider it opportune to publish a View of the Choir of Hereford Cathedral, which was reopened for divine worship about a twelvemonth since after having undergone the repairs and restorations intended to be effected by the late Mr. Scott, whose death, in 1862, has required five years for its completion. It has been conducted with the most scrupulous regard to preserve, as much as possible, even the minutest details of the original architecture and decoration.

The oldest parts of the building, which include the piers of the nave, the choir as high as the triforium gallery, and the south transept, are of Norman architecture, and were erected by Bishop Robert de Lungus immediately after the destruction, by fire, in 1079, of the Saxon church destroyed by fire some years before. The clerestory and vaulting of the nave, and the Lady Chapel, are in the Early English style, built in the middle or latter part of the thirteenth century. The choir is 73ft. in width, including the aisles, and 70ft. in height; the arches of the vaulting is 44ft. high. The main arches are of three orders, and spring from massive composite piers, with broad projections to the nave and choir; the smaller shafts are enriched with foliage and grotesque heads. The triforium in each bay consists of one wide Norman arch circumscribing two smaller, divided by a central shaft; the clerestory windows, together springing from massive semicircular piers. The clerestory, formed of two stories, is lighted by single lights with smaller windows on each side, affords the only way of admitting light to the choir, which is therefore pervaded by a solemn dimness, having rather an impressive effect.

The magnificent new screen of wrought-iron work, which separates the choir from the north and south aisles of the transepts, is, it is so light and open that if part of the congregation are assembled at the east end of the choir, under the central tower, and the two transepts, they can join with those in the choir in all the services of divine worship, notwithstanding the screen which is between them. It was designed by Mr. Scott, on the principles of the screen at Lichfield, but is a finer work—perhaps the finest thing of its kind produced in modern times. The entrance gates to the choir are divided by a slender shaft. The central arch, wider and higher than the others, is crowned and accompanied by a figure of Christ on the cross above. There is a figure of the Saviour, with his hands outstretched in blessing, on each side of the cross, and figures of angels, each in an attitude of adoration. Of these figures there are four, carved in wood; and other angle figures of angels, holding instruments of music, are placed at the ends of the screen. The sculptor of all these is Mr. R. L. Boulton, of Worcester, who also executed the sculpture for the angels and figures in the transepts and aisles. This variety of metal gives much diversity of colour; but the hammered iron-work, throughout the whole, is entirely left to be seen painted, and with very beautiful effect.

At the east of the choir is the Lady Chapel, Norman arch of five orders, the upper part of which is closed by a broad spandrel, covered with modern sculpture, between two pointed arches, which were erected by Mr. L. Cottingham, for the reception of some fine glass made seventy years ago. Below is a reredos of Bath stone and marble, sculptured with several designs, the central one representing the Crucifixion of Christ. This work is by Mr. Cottingham, jun., and was given as a memorial to Mr. Bailey, M.A. for Hereford, who died in 1850. Three lancet windows are of coloured glass, by Hardman, and form a back of the elevatory passage. The monumental effigies of three Bishops of Hereford—Aquablanca, who died in being 1215, 1474, and 1637, lie on their tombs in the bays of this chior. We do not here speak of the chancel, the Lady Chapel, and other parts of the building which are comprised in our illustration, but which have likewise been restored by the care of Mr. Scott. The particulars above given will suffice for the explanation of our Engraving. We may add, however, that the new organ, which was used in the musical performances of last week, is a magnificent instrument, with three complete manuals, forty-seven stops, and 2364 pipes. It is placed in the first arch on the south side of the choir, projecting over the stalls, behind which the organist is seated; the swell is placed in the triforium of the choir. This organ was built by Mr. Frederick Davison, of Pitercy-square, who has incorporated with it some of the pipes of the old organ, made by Renatus Harris, in the time of Charles II.

The annual competition for prizes offered to the Great Yarmouth Administrative Battalion began, on Monday week, at the practice-ground on the North Denes. There were fifteen competitors for a cup of the value of £9 5s., presented by the Mayor (Mr. R. Steward). The highest score was made by Corporal Wilshak, at present the champion shot of Norfolk. The second prize was of the value of £10, and was presented by the members for the borough, Sir E. N. K. Lacon, M.P., and Sir R. J. Harvey, M.P. Once again Corporal Wilshak was first, Sergeant Pearson being second. An hour's rest, the time of the competition prevailed more than one prize going to one person, Corporal Wilshak had to resign the second prize to Sergeant Pearson. The third competition was for a set of prizes offered by Major Cubitt and the officers of the battalion. Major Cubitt's prizes were £5, £3, and £2, open to all efficient members of the corps who had never won a money prize. The highest score was made by Corporal Day.——There was one bonus counting three thirds of the entrance fees, £3 5s. added, for the best scores of not less at 300 and 600 yards; and one third of the entrance fees, with £1 added, to the best score at 200 yards. The first prize was won by Corporal Wilshak, the second by Private Barnby. The last competition was for the Infield challenge cup, to be competed for annually by Private Barnby, and subsequently declared the champion shot for the year. Private Barnby also won the second prize in this match.

The annual competition of the members of the 4th Administrative Battalion of the Lincolnshire Volunteers for prizes of cups given by Colonel Dugdale and Major Bowes, took place last Saturday. The following were the successful competitors:—Private Ashcroft, Private Hill, Worsley; Sergeant Attwell, Leigh; Captain Jee, Leigh; Colour-Sergeant Timperley, Worsley; Private Ashcroft, Atherton; Corporal Hendley, Leigh; Private Bullough, Atherton; Corporal Burton, Leigh; Private Ainsworth, Atherton; Corporal Hyde, Worsley. The match was a shooting one, the contest between the 4th and 5th Lancashire Battalions was begun at the Astley Range, Blackburn, on Saturday afternoon. The result of the day's shooting was greatly in favour of the Preston battalion, which scored a total of 439, against 404 made by the Blackburn Volunteers. A million to be scored—and at Preston.——A match between the Preston Artillery Corps and the 3rd Lan. C. was came off last Saturday and Monday afternoon. There were fifteen men of each corps, and the ranges were 100 and 200 yards, five shots at each range. The result was in favour of the Artillery Corps.——The Knaresborough (the 19th Lancashire) underwent a rigid examination last Saturday afternoon and Monday, by Captain Wilkinson, the inspecting officer, as to their annual and platoon exercises, which were creditably gone through under Major Preston. The volunteers were in marching order, and on parade they went through the gun exercise, in which they proved themselves proficient. The men were complimented by the inspecting officer.

Last week's volunteer movements in Yorkshire were as follow:—The Hunsley and York corps met for a match, each a match at Goodham Dole. The result was a victory for the York men, who scored a total of 1000 points, against 1000 points. The Leeds volunteers shot for the challenge cup given by Captain Lucas and Lieuten.——Wilkinson, to be competed for annually by the corps. The cup last year, was ill and could not compete. The cup has to be won three times to give ownership, but it is competed for annually by the corps each year.——The Knaresborough volunteers have held their prize-shooting at Knaresborough. The cup, value £10, was won by Sergeant Wilkinson, defeating the claimsmanship of the corps, also gains the actual ownership of the cup. The Leeds Rifle Corps, the ladies' prize was won by Private Wilson; Private Wilcock, Corporal Groves, Private Parr, and Quartermaster-Sergeant Hall.——Shooting was given by the Mayor of Ripon, for which there were competitors with carbines, last large entries, and were won by Battery Sergeant-Major Murray, Sergeant-Major Jepson, Sergeant Bugler Jepson, Sergeant Bugler Cooper, and Gunner Wilkinson.

The Border Rifle Association held its annual meeting on Tuesday and Wednesday (last week). The broad medal for Roxburghshire was gained by Lieutenant Scott, of Galashiels, and the silver medal for the Selkirk medal. A purse of £25 was competed for by "the best attendere at drill," selected in accordance with regulations. This important meeting in Scotland, was the first prize, £10 was gained by Sergeant George Deans. The ladies' prize was won by Miss Forrest, and the gallery prize (that of Broderick's) prizes was carried off by Corporal Grieve; but his place was disputed by protest on the ground of his being a non-commissioned officer. The prizes were given for speed and volley firing, and the first was gained by the first class shots. Lieutenant-Colonel's prize Private Hicks won the most three times in the first piece, and in the concluding one gained, after shooting off a tie with Major Bodley, £10 returned.

EMBARKATION OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES AT DUNDEE.

On Saturday afternoon the Prince and Princess of Wales, with their infant son, Prince Albert Victor, embarked at the Queen's Dock, in the harbour of Dundee, on their voyage to Copenhagen. They left Abergeldie about nine o'clock in the morning, and, posting to Aboyne, took a special train there for the south. The train consisted of a saloon-carriage of the London and North-Western Railway and three first-class carriages. The youthful Prince Albert Victor was in the saloon-carriage, with his parents and nurse. At Aberdeen the Royal train was under charge of by the directors of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway, with Mr. Esplin, general manager; and Mr. Irvine Kemp, secretary. The train was timed to perform the distance from Aberdeen to Dundee in two hours, and it arrived at Broughty Ferry about eight minutes before three o'clock. This place is at the mouth of the Tay, about four miles below the town of Dundee. There were two points of embarkation in the Tay to choose between—namely, the harbour of Dundee and the pier at Broughty, used by the ferry-steamers of the North British Railway Company. The arrangement made, however, was that the Royal party should go from Dundee, and the Royal yacht Osborne was there to receive them. The Prince, though at first he wished that they should pass directly from the railway station to the docks or quay without any ceremonial, afterwards acceded to the pressing request of the Lord Provost and magistrates to allow his carriage to be escorted by a procession through the streets of the principal streets. The distance of the East Railway station from the Queen's Quay is over three furlongs, the access being direct, by way of Dock-street, between the shipping and the mercantile establishments. The route proposed was extended to about a mile and a half, and, diverging round a dock-street, the commercial premises of a square were formed by taking in Castle-street, High-street, and Union-street. It was with no little gratification that townspeople heard they were likely to have an opportunity of seeing the Royal visitors, and active attempts were made to decorate the houses in the line with flags, drapery, and other devices. Several hundred additional constables were engaged to keep the ground. The whole population was assembled in the streets. At the station, about 400 ladies and gentlemen were waiting to offer the first welcome to the Royal party. The train moved on to Dundee, and arrived there at twenty minutes past three o'clock. A very cordial cheer greeted the Prince and Princess. It was some time, however, before they could alight; for Lord Camperdown's carriages, which had been sent down to Broughty through making a rapid return by the road, had not yet arrived. At length, at half-past three, all was ready, and a procession, consisting of the carriages of the Sheriff, magistrates, and Council, and of the Royal party, emerged from the station amid the boisterous cheering of the multitude. The scene presented by the streets, which were densely thronged by the worshipping classes released from the spinning-mills, manufactories, and dockyards for their Saturday half-holiday, was of the most animating description. The prescribed route was passed through in about a quarter of an hour; and at a quarter to four the Royal carriage passed under the triumphal arch at the Queen's Quay, commemorative of the Royal visit of 1844. Within the archway and down the quay, which projects at a right angle from Dock-street, the volunteers were ranged as a guard of honour, and at the jetty the band was stationed and received the Royal pair with the notes of the National Anthem. At the jetty stood the deputy lord-lieutenant, the burgh of the Osborne, which had gone down to Broughty, having yet arrived. At length, flying its ten ones vigorously and displaying the Royal standard, the handsome steam-yacht glided gently till this detention there was a heavy fall of rain. (Our Special Artist made his sketch at the moment the Prince and Princess were stepping into the barge.) As the barge moved away a cordial cheer was once more raised, with no doubt, with best wishes for a safe and speedy return. About half an hour afterwards another barge came alongside for the baby Prince, who, in charge of his nurse, had been driven quietly and comparatively from the station to the pier. Meanwhile an artillery salute betokened the fact of the safe arrival of the Prince and Princess aboard the Osborne. Shortly an hour more elapsed before all the luggage was got on board. At length, about half-past five, the Osborne, with its companion vessels, the Salamis and the Medusa, got under steam and stood to sea, passing the bar of the river at Broughty shortly before six. The Royal squadron was accompanied down the Firth by nearly a score of steamers, some each with large numbers of passengers, and several of the larger ships conveyed the Royal party for about ten miles of the way.

HARVEST HOME OF THE PHILANTHROPIC SOCIETY'S FARM SCHOOL AT REDHILL.

Our Illustration represents a pleasant scene amidst the diversions with which the young inmates of the Philanthropic Society's Farm school were entertained at their annual harvest home. This institution, as most of our readers are aware, is designed for the reformation and moral reformation chiefly of boys under fifteen years of age, who have been convicted of crime and sentenced to a few years' detention in a reformatory under the Act 17 and 18 Victoria, cap. 86. The average number of boys maintained in the farm school at Redhill is about 220. They are trained in field husbandry, garden and house work, brickmaking, and other necessary trades. After their discharge from the farm school the half of the London boys and a smaller portion of those from Kent and Surrey are assisted to emigrate; the rest are sent back to their friends, or otherwise settled at home. The harvest home, on this occasion, attracted a number of visitors to see the games in a field near the farmyard, where each boy had been assigned his theirs occupation. Here, though the wet grass and soft ground somewhat interfered with the exercises, the boys conducted their prizes, in hurdle-racing, long and high jumping, flat-racing, jumping in sacks, tug-of-war, racing, balance riding, and climbing. A contest of a more irregular but not less agreeable character took place in the form of a very numerous allotment for a sackfull of apples, in the course of which no small amount of tumbling about ought to be seen. The very pretty hand knocks were received by the actors, who took all in good part, and appeared very well satisfied with his share. This part of the day's entertainment having concluded, the boys and the visitors left the field, and, passing under an arch of laurels, the centre of which supported a beehive, emblematical of the industry of the establishment, to the railway bridge to the chapel, where, at half-past five, the pupils sat down to a substantial supper. The walls were tastefully decorated with evergreens, and with flags bearing the names of the five houses, "The Queen, Gladstone, Gerston, Waterloo, Gurney." Suitable mottoes and texts appropriate were rounded by laurels. In one corner long a shield or tablet of honour, given by Miss Compton, to be held for a year by the house which has held the highest place for good conduct during the previous six months. It is a wooden tablet, on which is represented a shield, bearing an altar, and a hand taking a burning branch from the fire. At the top is inscribed "Philanthropic Farm Schools," and underneath, "Primus inter Pares." At the head of the chapel the visitors and guests were congregated, among whom were W. Gladstone, Esq., F.R.G.S., treasurer; W. K. Gladstone, Esq.; Charles White, Esq., J.P.; Rev. W. J. Harrison, Rev. J. Gooch; W. Clutton, Esq., Lond. Royal Mint; R. Hall, Esq.; H. N. Glossop, Esq., Chairman of Visiting Justices; W. C. L. Bathurst, Esq., M. Adams, Esq.; W. Clutten, Esq., Visiting Justices; Rev. S. Hawkes; T. B. Hallowes, Esq.; Dr. Shaw; F.G.S.; G. C. Richmond, Esq., and others. The chair was taken by the treasurer, who briefly addressed the meeting on the objects and condition of this reformatory institution. The chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Wallers, then read a report of the year, the gainers of which were called up, and received from the hands of the chairman knives, handkerchiefs, or other articles in their turn. One young fellow, named Sawyer, received a prize as champion reaper; another, named Coles, his prize as champion mower; another, for a well-kept garden. Prizes for general conduct, progress in school, cleanliness and order, were given. The proceedings being diversified by songs, and an address by Mr. Walters. The proceedings concluded by the boys singing the National Anthem. The Rev. Mr. Wallers, the chaplain, and his wife, during the sports played lively tunes in excellent style.

A notice from the Foreign Office states that passports are still required by persons entering Russia.

ANCIENT CELTIC RINGS FOUND IN THE HEBRIDES.

Our Engraving represents some remarkable ancient relics, probably belonging to the early Celtic period, found lately amid some ruins in the Western Islands of Scotland. These articles, now in the possession of Mr. James Ferguson, jeweller, of Union-street, Inverness, are said to have been found in a stone cell, or kist. Six of them are evidently ancient finger rings of the same description as are preserved in the antiquarian museums of the country. What the remaining articles are is not so apparent. The most curious of all has somewhat the shape of a modern earring, heavy and rude in the workmanship; but some antiquarians have supposed it to be one of the ancient torques or neck ornaments of our Celtic forefathers; and if it be so it will, from the rarity of specimens of the kind, prove an object of especial interest. The following is a more precise account of the whole, and description of these objects, as shown in our Illustration:—Nos. 1, 2, and 3 are plaited of eight wires each; No. 4 is plaited of three wires, and No. 5 plaited of three wires, but not finished at the ends. No. 6 is plaited of eight wires, but the end is cut, as is supposed, for the purpose of being altered in size. No. 7 seems to have been a torque, or ancient neck ornament. It is a bar, about the weight of the rings, and has very likely been cut in order to make a ring. It seems to be the end of an ingot or bar. All these articles are of pure gold.

From a document just issued it appears that the poor-law expenditure in the year ending the 25th of March last, amounted to £6,527,030, being an increase of £400,000 as compared with 1862.

A letter from Geneva announces the death of Ferdinand Lassalle, the social agitator so popular among the working classes of Germany. Lassalle was killed in a duel on the 28th ultimo.

The Tai-Pang-Nyo, a screw-steamer of 527 tons burden, commanded by Captain Gedick, has made the passage from England to Sondan in fifty-one days and four hours.

On the 16th ult. the double eagle, with the cross, was safely hoisted on the top of the Cathedral of St. Stephen, at Vienna. In the evening there was a popular festival in the Prater—a so-called "Constitutions Fest"—at which above 200,000 persons were, it is stated, present.

The number of persons who arrived in Quebec during the month of June was 7,276, as against 1963 were from England, 928 from Ireland, 891 from Scotland, 1204 from Germany, and 1290 from the British Provinces. The number of vessels arrived was 49, 31 of which were steamers with passages by charitable societies, and the remainder chiefly cargoes. 1912 British and 3125 foreign immigrants proceeded thence to the United States.

An American paper states that a few weeks ago a tract of country in the vicinity of Sacramento, California, was inundated, was visited with a tornado, levelling barns, houses, &c., killing cattle, and literally chopping up and blasting every description of crops, making lamentations in the fencing and such buildings as withstood the storm as though they had been fired on by a battalion of muskets balls. Trees were not only denuded of their leaves, but the bark was chopped as with an axe.

The submarine cable between Otranto and Valona has been completed. The previous attempt in February, by the same contractors, to connect the two points by a cable was frustrated on the vessel out at the end of the cable to be laid, but the ingenuity of the engineers, and considerable improvements in the paying apparatus, soon overcame the difficulties in the fencing and such buildings as withstood the storm as though they had been fired on by a battalion of muskets balls. Trees were not only denuded of their leaves, but the bark was chopped as with an axe.

Mr. Brailey, have succeeded in picking up from a depth, unprecedented in any other submarine cable, of 1,000 fathoms. The completion of this line will bring Constantinople into more direct communication with London.

According to a report just addressed from Leghorn to the Italian Government, the cattle disease, which are a great resource for the poorer classes, employ 800 boats, manned by about 4000 men. The fishing-establishments, pay of the men, tenure of the nets, &c., amount to about £100,000, distributed among more than 6000 persons of different professions. About 100 tons of coral are annually introduced into the Kingdom of Italy. The articles made of it and exported are to the value of from 12,000,000 to 15,000,000f., yearly principally sent to Asia, Africa, and America.

The Italian pastes, so largely used in culinary preparations, are chiefly made in the neighbourhood of Castellamare, the three principal centres being that city, Gragnano, and Torre Annunziata. Castellamare contains seventy-four manufactories, and twenty-four steam mills employed in the preparation of corn for this manufacture. Gragnano and Torre Annunziata do not contain so many factories, each employing about 2000 persons. The pastes made in Castellamare are said to be the finest. Semolina is principally used for this purpose, and the flours principally used is brought from the Black Sea. More than 72,000 tons are annually consumed.

Count de Chasseloup-Laubat, French Minister of Marine, has addressed a letter to the Municipal councils of Algeria, in the interests of those towns which recently took place on board a transport-vessel belonging to the French navy, on account of the circumstance of persons, Arabs, who were the first passengers in their occasional apparel forced to take part in the ceremonies of Christian worship, but which compelled the Arabs for his still more to leave the ship. The Minister instructs the prefects to call on captains of vessels to prohibit in future all interference with religious matters, and to enforce the respect due to religious and the sacred character of its ministers.

The Journal de l'Algérie states that Si-Abdallah, a famous lion-hunter of Bona (Algeria), has presented to the museum of that town two skins of a lioness, in killing which he nearly lost his life. Sometime since Si-Abdallah, who enjoyed great reputation in the country, heard of the ravages and damage in hunting lions, of which he had already killed eleven, was informed that a lioness had committed dreadful ravages among the cattle of a neighbouring tribe, and he accordingly went in pursuit of it, armed with a long single-barrelled shot gun. He soon found the animal and concealed himself in a wood which he knew she frequented, and shot her dead. The subject of Bona had Si-Abdallah conveyed to the military hospital, where he received every necessary attention and has since completely recovered from his injuries.

SPORTS OF THE MONTH.—SEPTEMBER.

PARTRIDGE and pigeon shooting may now be had to perfection. Of the latter, it may be said that a fine day at the Old Hats, at Ealing, on the Uxbridge road, and the Red House, Battersea, were the most decrous is no longer patronised, while the latter has fallen away by the modern improvements of Chelsea Bridge and the new park. Of the many remarkable shots that were wont to assemble at the Red House shooting-inclosure we may mention the late Lord Kenelworthy and the lamented General Anson, Captain Ross, Mr. Osbaldeston (the Autocrat), Grant, and Shoolbred; Lord Ranelagh, Messrs. Gilmore, Farnsworth, Grant, &c. On the 30th of June, 1829, the following unparalleled sweepstakes came off:—The parties were Lord Ranelagh, Captain Ross, Messrs. Osbaldeston, Grant, and Shoolbred; Lord Ranelagh and Ross to shoot reciprocally four dead birds in advance. The match became a tie at the fifteenth double shot between Richard Toomey, who shot for Osbaldeston, and Mr. Edmund Edwood and, nately, killed eight pigeons out of twenty; and one of the birds that did not drop had a leg carried off by the ball. They likewise, with a single bullet, struck, twice out of four times, a cricket-ball thrown into the air; and Richard Toomer, at a cricket-match near Holland Bridge, with a common fowling-piece shot, struck the ball twelve times successively when bowled by Harris, one of the best bowlers in England.

We find that this sport has been revived, and Hornsey-wood now stands prominently forward as the spot where excellent sport with the "blue rocks" is to be had. Of the origin of pigeon-shooting we have no authentic record; but it was in full vogue so early as the reign of Charles II., as in an old sporting work of February, 1793, we find the following notice:—

"The great celebrity of this sport, by which some of the first shots in England are so frequently distinguished, encourages us to communicate an account of its fashionable influence and increasing precedence as a polite amusement. It is a sport entirely confined to gentlemen, and from this denomination are of two kinds—the first are supported by private subscription among such gentlemen only as are members of their district and separate clubs; others, more extensive, are subscribed for one, or take place, by public contribution from candidates of every description, and are frequently the subject of much heart-burning by the landlords of inns, who offer prizes of pieces of plate, purses of money, or, more occasionally a fat pig or cow to be shot for. This practice of pigeon-shooting is common in almost every part of the kingdom, but in none is it so frequently repeated, or so fashionably followed, as in and around London. In the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, Berkshire, Hampshire, and Surrey, it is patronised during the season in perpetual succession from one to another. Having proceeded thus far in our general account, it remains now to enter into such a description of the sport as may render it perfectly easy of apprehension to those who have never had an opportunity to be present at so earnest a struggle for superiority. In direct conformity with these rules, the sport is to the match, as it is generally made and decided between a given number of gentlemen belonging to clubs, when, by tossing up for choice, they select their stations in rotation till the party is completely formed, which may be contracted or extended to any number that is required for the convenience of the company intending to shoot. The match thus made, and the names of the opponents arranged in a proper paper by the arbiter, the sport begins in the following way:—Several dozens of pigeons, having been previously put into separate boxes, are disposed in baskets behind the company, who wait the destructive circumstance of their liberty. Each person then to instant death or gives them liberty. A shallow box of about a foot long and eight or ten inches wide, is in the ground parallel with the surface, and just twenty-one yards from the footmark at which each gunner is bound to take his aim. The box has a sliding lid, to which is affixed a string, by which it may be opportunely drawn up, who is placed next the person going to shoot, from whom he takes the word of command for drawing up the sliding-lid, and letting out the bird to his aim; another pigeon being so expeditiously placed in the box for the succeeding shot (by the attendant who furnish the birds) that ten, twelve, or fifteen dozen of pigeons are deposited in the box, drawn, and shot at in much less time than it is possible to conceive. The gunner is not permitted to fire unless he stands or shoulder till the bird is on the wing, and the bird must fall within one hundred yards of the box, or is deemed a lost bird. Among this rapid succession of each side shooting alternately the arbiter is peculiarly exciting opposite to the gunner, as the success of every individual by A 1, or A 9; this at the end of the match is summed up, and declared, by demonstrating which party has killed most pigeons at the least number of shots. Excellent as this general betting upon the match, there is a variety amongst individuals—the shots of some against others, and the field betting on the success of the gun, as may many prompts or the reputation of the gunner dictate. The fate of these pigeons is not uncertain, at an equal number of shots with the rest, is, by such pre-eminence, declared the victor, and, stands elected champion for the meeting, and does the offices of the table accordingly. Clubs of this description are numerous, and still more numerous, generally come under the denomination of a help-sale or make feast, at the instigation of those individuals who have frequently an equality of success in pieces of plate, to be given to the three best shots; but as the amusement of entering the lists it becomes a collateral part of the contract that each adventurer is to contribute a certain sum towards the prize, and also to pay for his pigeons, and dine at the ordinary. These matters properly and previously arranged is carried on precisely in the manner before described, with this exception only, that here every individual shoots for himself alone, without any connection of party. The candidate killing most pigeons at the least number of shots, becomes entitled to the piece of plate highest in value, and so on in proportion; but with a number of candidates there is frequently an equality of success; in such cases they are called ties, and are shot off at remaining pigeons till the match is ascertained, and the victor proclaimed. This done, the day concludes with a supper, regulated by the liberality or resources of the parties concerned. Looking, however, to its character as a matter of sport, little or nothing can be said in its favour when put in competition with the more noble and lively amusement of shooting over dogs. In fact, the latter sport feels a repugnance at the idea of first confining and then shooting down from their perch, herds of domestic animals, doomed to instant death, with a very slender possibility in their favour, when a moderate shot will bring down fourteen or fifteen out some fourteen out of twenty. The picture forms but an indifferent idea of the sportsman's humanity who indulges largely in this species of gratification; and further, we believe, on reasonable and true information of the inexperienced, that it is the most infuriating and expensive amusement of the sportsman can possibly engage in; for one day very seldom terminates the whole appointment of a second—one extravagance as constantly engenders another, to the entire exclusion of economy, which is upon all similar occasions severally laughed out of countenance. Experience has also convinced us that eight, nine, or ten pounds for pigeons, in addition to the fashionable bill for exorbitances of the day (amounting to the inconsiderable reckoning of two or three pounds), has sent many a pigeon-shooter to his bed and awakened him to the pillow of reflection."

We have given the above extract in full, because it shows the system of pigeon-shooting in bygone days. Since the new grounds at Hornsey-wood have been opened and Mr. Frank Heathcote has kindly devoted his time to handicapping, this sport has been greatly on the ascendant, and now a day with the "blue rocks" is looked forward to with much pleasure by the Londoners.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE EARL OF MORLEY.

The Right Hon. Edmund Parker, second Earl of Morley, Viscount Boringdon, of North Molton, and third Baron Boringdon, of Boringdon, in the county of Devon, was the only surviving child of John, first Earl of Morley and second Baron Boringdon, by his second wife, Frances, only daughter of Thomas Talbot, Esq., of Gerrans, Norfolk. He was born June 15, 1810, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, succeeded his father March 14, 1840. His Lordship was a Liberal in politics, but, having been paralyzed in the legs, and unable to walk, he had been obliged to resign his seat, and was also a frequent contributor to the local charities. His Lordship died, after a long illness, on the 11th inst., at his residence, near Chudleigh, the seat of his relatives, the Parkers, at Saltram, and the residence of his mother-in-law, Mrs. Harris of Radford. He was married in 1839, but as his wife, Sophia, daughter of Sir Thomas Theobald Mostyn, Bart., died in February, 1840, the Earl was left a widower in the early part of his career. He married, secondly, on the 4th of August, 1841, Lady Georgiana Augusta Frederica Elizabeth Leveson-Gower, eldest daughter of the present Duke of Sutherland, by whom he has left issue two sons and two daughters. The eldest son, Edmund Parker, Esq., of Whiteway, Devon, and widower of Winifred Curteis, the only daughter of Thomas Curteis, Esq., of Windmill Hill, Sussex, by whom he has left issue one son, Edmund Parker, Esq., born in 1863, and one daughter, Winifred Mary, born in 1862. The second son, the Hon. Robert Parker, Esq., of Whiteway, Devon, and widower of William Curteis, the only daughter of Thomas Curteis, Esq., of Windmill Hill, Sussex, by whom he has left issue one son, Robert Curteis Parker, born in 1861, and one daughter, Georgiana Mary, born in 1863. The eldest daughter, Lady Sophia Katherine Parker, is also unmarried. The second daughter, Lady Georgiana Augusta Frederica Parker, married, on the 11th of August, 1863, Sir Thomas Theobald Mostyn Lloyd Mostyn, Bart., of Mostyn, Flintshire, and has issue one son, Thomas Edmund Mostyn, born in 1864. The late Earl was succeeded in his title and estates by his brother, the Hon. and Rev. Henry Parker, who was born June 11, 1843, and for whom the late lamented Prince Consort stood sponsor. On the 11th of August, 1863, Lord Morley, is of old standing and of high connection in the county of Devon, and has been distinguished in the Navy and in Parliament. His grandson, Admiral Sir Hyde Parker belonged to it, and the first Peer of the house was John Parker, Esq., in several Parliaments for the county of Devon, who was created Lord Boringdon in 1784. His son, John, second Baron, was created Earl of Morley and Viscount Boringdon in 1815, and was father of the Earl just deceased.

SIR THOMAS G. S. SEBRIGHT, BART.

Sir Thomas George Saunders Sebright, eighth Baronet, of Beaford, in the county of Worcester, who died, on the 29th ult., of congestion of the lungs, at his seat, Beechwood House, near Dunstable, Bedfordshire, was the seventh Baronet by the title, M.P. for Herts, the seventh Baronet by Sewell, Harrold, and Hardingstone, in the county of Northampton, Cranfield, Eaq., of West Harling, Norfolk. He was born in 1801, and succeeded his father, on eighth Baronet, April 15, 1846. He was of High Sheriff of Herts in 1850, and was a Deputy Lieutenant of that county. He married first, Nov. 17, 1841, Sarah Anne, daughter of Captain Hoffmann, R.N., by whom (who died Feb. 14, 1846) he has had one son, his successor. He married, secondly, in 1850, Olivia, youngest daughter of John Joseph Farquhar, Esq., and Lady Emily, his wife, daughter of William Robert, second Duke of Leinster, K.P., by whom (who died Jan. 27, 1859) he leaves three sons. Sir Thomas is succeeded by his eldest son, now Sir Thomas Saunders Sebright, the ninth Baronet, who was born Aug. 29, 1843. Of this ancient family, Peter Sebright, of Sebright Hall, Essex, living at the end of the thirteenth century, held his estate by the Petit Serjeanty of "presenting the King's pipe when he should ride forth to any of the King's charge, whensoever he visited those parts." From this Peter's second son descended Sir Edward Sebright, High Sheriff of Worcester in 1615, whose Charles I. created a Baronet, Dec. 29, 1626. Sir Edward's grandson (Sir Edward, the third Baronet) married Anne, daughter and heiress of Thomas Saunders, Esq., of Beechwood, Herts, thus bringing that estate into the family, and was the direct ancestor of the Baronet just dead and the present Baronet. In 1723 a member of this house, the third Baronet's second son, Edward Sebright, Esq., was married to Grisila, wife Baroness of the same English compulsions. A monument was erected to his memory near the spot where the crime was committed.

SIR CHARLES KNIGHTLEY, BART.

Sir Charles Knightley, second Baronet, of Fawsley, Northamptonshire, who died on the 4th ult. at his seat, Fawsley Park, near Daventry, was the eldest son of the first Charles Knightley, by his wife, Elizabeth, only daughter of Henry Boultbee, Esq., of Moulton, Lincolnshire. He was born June 30, 1781, and was created a Baronet, Dec. 30, 1809, and was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford. He succeeded his father, on his uncle, the Rev. Sir John Knightley, the first Baronet, who obtained the baronetcy by creation, Feb. 2, 1798, with remainder in default of male issue to the heirs male of the body of his deceased brother, the Rev. Charles Knightley. He was some time a representative to the family honours and estates that Sir Charles Knightley entered Parliament. He first contested the southern division of Northamptonshire in 1831, but was not then successful. He was returned in 1834, and sat for that division till the dissolution in 1837. From that year to 1852 he sat for that division of the county in the Conservative interest, and opposed many of the "free-trade" measures of the late Sir Robert Peel. Since his retirement from Parliament he has chiefly devoted himself to agricultural improvements and the welfare and comfort of his tenantry. No man was more respected in the county than he was. He was very popular with his tenants. He was a liberal politics to interfere with personal friendships. Sir Charles was a great friend of the celebrated Mary Russell Mitford, agricultural improvements, and the welfare and comfort of his tenantry. No man was more respected in the county than he was. He was very popular with his tenants. He was a liberal politics to interfere with personal friendships. Sir Charles was a great friend of the celebrated Mary Russell Mitford, agricultural improvements, and

SIR JOHN RATCLIFF.

The Worshipful Sir John Ratcliff, a highly distinguished Alderman, and three times Mayor of Birmingham, was born there in 1798, the eldest son (by his wife, Mary, daughter of John Lesley, Esq.) of John Ratcliff, Esq., of Lothury, Hertfordshire, a successful Birmingham manufacturer. He himself commenced business at an early age, and was successful and rapidly prosperous. He was, in 1852, elected a member of the Town Council of Birmingham, and was subsequently raised to the post of Alderman of the borough; and in 1856 he was elected by Mayor, and held that office without intermission till 1859, having been elected to it three times in succession, a distinction unprecedented in the annals of the Corporation. During the first time of his occupying the mayoralty, several events occurred to bring about the long popularity he acquired. The present Lord Lieutenant, on the eve of the greater portion of the Birmingham suburban parish of Edgbaston, generously offered to appropriate thirty acres of land in the Park-shore-road there, as a place of recreation for the inhabitants of Birmingham and its neighborhood. The donation was readily accepted by the Town Council, and Mr. Ratcliff, then Mayor, in order to give greater éclat to the opening of this place of recreation—Calthorpe Park—invited the Duke of Cambridge to assist in the inauguration. The Duke came, and the 1st of June, 1857, the day fixed for the opening of the Park, was a memorable one in a general holiday, and all went off brilliantly. Again, on the formation of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, the Mayor came prominently forward. He, in connection with his brother, Charles Ratcliff, Esq., barrister-at-law, was instrumental in bringing the members of the Association to visit their manufactories in Birmingham; and on that occasion Earl (then Lord John) Russell, Lord Stanley, and other distinguished members of the association, were the guests of Mr. Ratcliff during the week of the proceedings. He also invited the Queen of Holland to visit Birmingham. In 1858, Mr. John Ratcliff was re-elected Alderman, since which time he retired to a great extent from public life. He was, however, in the chair at the meeting which originated the movement for the purchase of Aston Hall and Park for the people. In politics Sir John was a Liberal in the extreme, but he was no active member of any party. He was also a Freemason, and a member of the Grand Lodge of England, in which he held the office of Grand Deacon. He was F.S.A., and F.G.S., of the Provincial Lodge of Warwickshire. Sir John Ratcliff died on the 1st inst., at his residence, Victoria-square, Edgbaston, Birmingham.

The Duke of Cleveland died on Tuesday, at his seat, Raby Castle, in the county of Durham.

Maria Anne, Princess de Polignac, one of the celebrities of a bygone era, died in Paris on Saturday. She was the daughter of Lord Rancliffe, of Bunny Park, Nottinghamshire. The Hon. Miss Rancliffe married, first (in 1817), the Marquis de Chalmel, the head of a distinguished French family. In 1825 she married the Prince Jules Armand Auguste Jeanbaptiste, Prince Polignac.

Lady Mary Hamilton died on Saturday last. The deceased lady was the second daughter of the late Lord Fauconberg by his first marriage. She was born Nov. 30, 1799.

CHESS.

PROBLEM No. 1073.
By Mr. H. ENGELHARDT.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in three moves.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

C. ASHFORD.—Practice of the blind spoken of you will find a very salutary discipline and, eventually, a source of much pleasure. Your solutions of the problems are correct.

J. MAYO.—He would be mated at once by 3. R to K Kt 6th!

J. LYON, Dundee.—Many. At what period of the game do you propose to play the moves in question? You ask if "Kt to K 2d5, followed by B to Q 3rd," in a certain game, would be a mistake to advantage; but you only give us one of the moves? 2. The "Chess Player's Chronicle," Nos. 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148.

J. G. MARSHALL.—Your solution of No. 1067 to Black's play of 1. Kt to K 1(4) 3rd appears to be 2. R to Q B 2nd. The Problem itself is quite sound.

E. P.—In future be good enough to omit a diagram of any position referred to. Your position involved the playing of the same move twice over, and, as the case, we are sorry to say, is one instance out of ten where this trouble is imposed, it ought never to have been published. 2. Kt to Q 3rd (ch) is the move, and we are sorry to say that your position is not worthy of a place in two or three months.

VICAR.—We shall have much pleasure in looking over the M.S. games of two such strong players as Mr. Bellamy and Mr. Boden. Any game, any time, will be welcome.

SECRETARY.—The AMATEUR'S attention is particularly directed to our remarks on his Problem No. 1, in the Number for Chess Correspondents of last week.

PHILO S.—Your letter shall have every consideration; but is it not a waste of powder and shot to expend it upon such a target?

R. B.—Many men, many minds. To us the player named has always appeared to be possessed of a very high order of talent. We do not know his address.

No. 1278.—VOL. XLV. SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1864. WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE

THE PRINCESS OF WALES IN DENMARK.

THE first visit of a young wife and mother to the home in which her maiden years were passed usually calls into liveliest exercise the purest and tenderest affections of woman's nature. Filial love, stirred by the new excitement, gushes forth in fresh streams, and, if it were possible, more copiously than ever. Sweet reminiscences and pleasant associations flash unexpected gleams of sunlight into her bosom. There are new experiences to go over, and, possibly, dawning griefs to be disclosed, which can only be confided to parental sympathy. Many yearnings relating to the old home and its inmates find satisfaction, and a hundred carefully-treasured thoughts are brought out to the light and lovingly communicated to the dear ones who, it is known, will value them. Few scenes of domestic life have upon them a rosier touch of genuine human interest wholly independent of accidental circumstances.

The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Denmark—the first which her Royal Highness has paid to the home of her childhood since her marriage—claims passing notice. It is not an affair of State. It is merely a family event, devoid of all political significance. It represents nothing so far as England is concerned. It awakens no expectation in Denmark. It is really and simply what it professes to be—a domestic reunion with which statesmen have nothing to do, and in which hearts play the only important part, while politics are excluded. But the subjects of her most gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, owing to whatever cause, claim to participate in all that interests their Princes; and a large majority of them, no doubt, will have watched the movements of the Royal family in Denmark with a sympathising inquisitiveness near akin to that with which they would watch the movements of their own near relatives in a similar case.

Since the memorable March which witnessed the public entry of the Princess into London a rapid series of events has occurred, likely enough to have cast a shadow of gloom—only temporarily we may hope—over her maiden home. The sudden death of the King of Denmark; the accession of the Prince, her father, by treaty right, to the throne; the unexpected Augustenburg claim to the succession; the hasty determination of the Federal Diet to proceed to execution in Holstein; the excitement of the German people; the joint resolution of Austria and Prussia; the invasion of Schleswig; the retreat of the Danish army from the Dannewerk; the military occupation of Jutland; the capture of the Düppel forts; the London Conference; the suspension of hostilities; the failure of negotiations for peace; the recommencement of the war, and the loss of the island of Alsen; the abandonment of Denmark to her cruel fate by the signitaries of the Treaty of 1852, and the hard terms imposed upon her by her giant conquerors:—here is a train of events none of which can be regarded by the Royal family of Denmark with other than despondent feelings. The Princess of Wales must have keenly felt the misfortunes which successively befell her native country and home—possibly may have shared with her husband a sense of mortification at the chilling prudence of England in abstaining from war on behalf of the country for whom her diplomacy had been unusually active and energetic. At any rate, the bitter past will doubtless have been reviewed at the family meeting—its mistakes, perhaps, detected and acknowledged, its calamities lamented, its lessons of experience sealed and put by for future use. Sorrow has come to the youthful Princess soon (too soon, the unobservant may think) after her exaltation; but it has come, not to destroy her peace, but to mellow her character. She revisits her parents under a sense of that higher dignity imparted to youth by the baptism of affliction; and she has found, we may be sure—as all sensible women under the like conditions have found—that the events which have most disturbed her equanimity have also most enlarged the area of communion and sympathy between herself and the loved ones of her old home.

In all other respects Princess Alexandra will naturally have accompanied her husband to Denmark with a glowing sense of pleasure and pride. She was but a girl when she left home, and had tasted only a girl's experience. Not above eighteen months have since elapsed, and she is a woman, with a woman's cares, having been advanced meanwhile to the nobility of wifeship and motherhood. The brief interval comprises the greatest and most rapid change which woman's nature can undergo in her career of life on earth. It is the season of blossom-setting, when what was theretofore but promise and expectation only is superseded by maturity and substance. And as it materially modifies a woman's relationship to the external world, so it wonderfully ripens her character by awakening new instincts, exciting new hopes and fears, filling her bosom with new joys and anxieties, and developing a higher, because a more unselfish, order of affections. She feels in herself: her sense of it appears in her carriage, her style of expression, her entire manner. Nor is this, primarily, it is as delightful in fact as it is attractive in prospect to carry all this fresh experience home, and silently, unobtrusively, but nevertheless unreservedly, make the whole family, as far as it can be, a sharer in the glory of it. The public can only witness the scenes of family life within the precincts of Royalty reverentially and from afar; but the incidents which are told of Alexandra's first day at Frederisborg Castle point with unmistakable force to the conclusion that she has felt the delights common to her and to the earlier years of married life, and that the home that she left for the home that she found elicits a fuller gush of affectionate feeling than even in former days, but without lessening in the least her appreciation of, or devoted attachment to, the objects and sphere of her later choice.

The Royal couple have taken with them the baby Prince, and the mother's exultation will, of course, be revived in the pride of the grandmother and in the unconcealed delight of the juvenile uncles and aunts. There will have been, as in the humbler grades of life, much cooing to and fro of the youngster, much peering into his little face, many more kisses than he can patiently bear, and many and varied congratulatory speeches to the parents.

The experience connected with this visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Denmark is of a momentous and peculiar mingled with it, happily, however, such only as arise out of public events which it was not within their power either to control or modify. Otherwise, it resembles in all its main features that which myriads of the Queen's subjects can sympathisingly realise. And herein consists its chief interest for the British public. That genuine loyalty which Englishmen of all classes cherish for their Sovereign and for the younger branches of her family is no merely superstitious sentiment. It has its roots in a real commingling of affections between the one and the other—affections which manifest themselves in personal participation in the events of life. Elsewhere it may be deemed politic to surround monarchy with a halo of divinity, and to impress the imagination with a sense of the immeasurable distance between the ruler and the ruled. Here, there is no such sentiment. The people of this country are content with nothing better, than to share with their princes the sentiments and emotions which belong to daily human and domestic life; and out of this community of feeling they draw the strength of their loyal attachment to the Throne.

It needs not, therefore, any political hope or expectation to invest this visit with lively interest, as far as the people of the United Kingdom are concerned. If it were an affair of State it would probably sink to the ordinary level of political events. Being as it is, an exclusively domestic matter, in which love rather than policy seeks satisfaction, and the warmer feelings of the heart are stirred by it, watch it, busy themselves with its daily scenes, and realise pleasure in its successive and varied incidents. And the result will be the revivification of the affectionate attachment which the married life of the Royal couple has already evoked. Accompanying them on this first visit of the youthful and princely pair to the maiden home, the public renew their interest in the well-being of those with regard to whom they entertain such high expectations. They read somewhat of their own future in the present of the Prince and Princess; and in every manifestation of filial and connubial love they find predictions of blessings yet to come. One with our fellow-subjects in this respect, we loyally and heartily wish the Royal pair a delightful visit and a safe return.

THE GATHERING OF HIGHLAND CLANS AT BRAEMAR CASTLE.

Our front page displays an Engraving, from a sketch by Mr. Colebrooke Stockdale, of the second meeting, Thursday, the 1st inst., when the annual muster of the sturdy Highlandmen for their favourite athletic sports and feats of strength or skill took place, in the presence of the Prince and Princess of Wales. Some account of these proceedings was given in our last Number, with a view of Braemar. The games themselves, however, were not particularly described. The chief interest lay in the competition for the prizes open to "all comers." The champions on the ground were Donald Dinnie, Aboyne; Paton, of Muthly; M'Fadzane, of Elgin; Robertson, of Glenesk; and the local favourite, Grant, of Parkhill. Of course, with these on the green, high expectations were entertained, and these were certainly realised, as Dinnie sent the stone over 29 ft. 8 in., and threw the hammer 88 ft. 4 in. The tossing of the caber was, however, the most interesting of any of the competitions; and in this the renowned Donald came off victorious with a remarkably clean "toss," followed by that of Paton, Anthe close, Donald, although he had got on his cloak and was retiring, quietly took up the caber, and without the slightest apparent effort turned it over. For the half-mile race, for a prize of £5 offered by Lieutenant-Colonel Farquharson, of Invercauld, there were no less than seventeen competitors at the start. The race, which caused much excitement, was very keenly contested, and easily won by Robertson, the Glenesk champion. Considerable interest was also evinced in the dancing of "Gillie Callum," which went game off, as well as the dancing of the strathspey and reel. The following gentlemen were judges of the dancing:—Messrs. Ross, the Queen's piper; M'Lennan, Lord Fife's piper; and P. Coats, Lieutenant-Colonel Farquharson's piper. Four were called out to decide the prize for strathspey, amongst whom was Paton, but he, having lent his shoes to another of the competitors, was prevented from dancing, and other four went through the reel. The other judges were Mr. Alex. Ewan, Braemar, and Mr. James Coutts, Crathie. The following are the decisions:—

FOR THE SOCIETY'S PRIZES.

Level Race, 600 yards (seven competitors).—1, Donald Grant, Castleton of Braemar; 2, John M'Intosh, Braemar.

Putting the Stone, 28 lbs. (four competitors).—1, Alexander Grant, Birkhall, 29 ft. 8 in.; 2, John M'Hardy, Glenlivet, 24 ft. 10 in.

Throwing the Hammer, 16 lbs. (five competitors).—1, Donald Dinnie, Aboyne, 88 ft. 4 in.; 2, A. Robertson, Glenesk, 72 ft. 4 in.

Tossing the Caber (five competitors).—1, Charles M'Hardy, P.C., Dumbarton; 2, M. M'Dougall, Inverey.

EXTRA PRIZES—OPEN TO ALL COMERS.

Putting the Stone (seven competitors).—1, Donald Dinnie, Aboyne, 29 ft. 8 in.; 2, A. Grant, Birkhall, 27 ft. 6 in.

Throwing the Hammer (six competitors).—1, Donald Dinnie, Aboyne, 84 ft. 4 in.; 2, James Paton, Muthly, 79 ft. 10 in.

Tossing the Caber (six competitors).—1, Donald Dinnie; 2, James Paton.

Half-mile Race (seventeen competitors), for prize of £5, awarded by Lieut.-Col. Farquharson, of Invercauld.—1, Alex. Robertson, Glenlui.

Dancing Gillie Callum, for prize of £5, given by H.R.H. the Prince of Wales (fifteen competitors).—1, Alex. Ross, Ballater.

Dancing Strathspey and Reels, for prize of £5, given by the Societies of Edinburgh and Perthshire.—1, John Grant, Parkhill.

The above is the official prize-list so far as it goes; but the list does not give the result of the competitions, as, by the rules of the association, some of the competitors gave up their claims to certain prizes to qualify them for taking others. The following results of the competitions for the Queen's piper's purse of £10 may be added:—In the level race, Alexander Grant, Birkhall, came in second; in putting the stone, Alexander Robertson, Glenlui, was placed with a "put" of 26 ft. 7 in.; in throwing the hammer, the second place was held by Alexander Grant, Birkhall, who threw the hammer 71 ft. 4 in. Alexander Grant was also first for tossing the caber, but had held that place on a previous occasion. In the course of the day Lord Macduff gave a run in the hounds, a compeld for the sum of £3 10s.—for running high leap, for running long leap, for standing long leap, and for standing high leap. The running high leap was gained by Donald Dinnie, who cleared 5 ft. 9 in., Alexander Ascrombie equaing him at 5 ft.

A decree of the Emperor excludes Jews in the western provinces from the right of acquiring land and farms, recently conferred upon their body. The exclusion is believed to be ordered because it was feared that the Jewish capitalists of the western provinces were likely to be the purchasers of the estates of the Polish rebels for the benefit of the despoiled proprietors themselves.

The Chicago Convention has nominated M'Clellan for President, and Pendleton, of Ohio, for Vice President. The "platform" adopted is that the Union shall be maintained, efforts shall be made to bring about a cessation of hostilities and a convention of the States.

At Mobile Fort Morgan surrendered, with 600 prisoners, on the 23rd ult., after twenty-four days' bombardment by the Federal land and sea forces. The Confederates spiked the cannon and destroyed all other material in the fort previous to the surrender.

Another Federal success is the occupation of Atlanta. Secretary Stanton reports that one corps of Sherman's army had entered the place. Sherman had been previously marching on the Macon Railroad, which had been cut by Kilpatrick. Hood, finding communications defeated, appears to have moved southward, when a battle ensued on the Macon-road, in which it is said the Federals were successful.

At the other great point of interest in the struggle (Petersburg) there had also been active work going on, rather unfavourable to the Federals, however. On the 25th ult. the Confederates attacked General Hancock's position on the south of the Reams Station on the Weldon Railroad, and, after a desperate fight, retook four of the seven sides of the line which the Federals had occupied. The Federal loss is estimated at 2000 men and nine guns, while that of the Confederates is said to amount to 5000 men. Mr. Stanton reports that if General Grant can be reinforced by 100,000 new troops the success of his movements for the capture of Richmond will be made certain.

There are conflicting reports respecting the state of affairs in the Shenandoah Valley. Some account represents Early to have retreated and Sheridan to have started in pursuit. A later telegram, however, says that the two armies were still confronting each other.

Gold at last accounts was quoted at 240.

The Minister Plenipotentiary from the Government of the Emperor Maximilian had arrived at Washington.

EXTRADITION OF MULLER.

On the 27th ult., the case of the extradition case of Muller, charged with the murder of Mr. Briggs, was resumed before the United States Commissioner, Mr. Shaw. The British Government was represented by Mr. F. F. Marbury, as on the previous day; while Messrs. Chauncey Schaffer and E. Blankman appeared for the prisoner. The court was thronged with spectators anxious to obtain a view of the accused, who sat with an unmoved countenance. Mr. Schaffer, for the defence, maintained that as yet there was nothing to justify Müller's committal. The accused being a foreigner, he contended that the treaty under which the extradition was demanded had been suspended, and he also adverted to the Florida as being a vessel sent out by English subjects. Inspector Tanner having been re-examined as to the height of Müller, Mr. Schaffer argued at length to show that Müller could not be one of the two men seen in the compartment with Mr. Briggs on the night of the murder. Commissioner Newton then delivered his decision, stating that, under the circumstances, he was constrained to grant a certificate, and commit the prisoner, being satisfied as to his guilt.

Müller was given into the custody of Inspector Tanner, and left New York on the following day, by the Asia with, no doubt, arrive in England before this Number is in our readers' hands.

VICTORIA.

MELBOURNE, July 26.—In politics, business, and everything else, with the exception of the ill-treatment of criminals, this has been a dull month. The intention of the Home Government to persist in sending convicts to Western Australia, as evinced by the message through it to influence the fate of a bill legalising recommendations of the Penal Servitude Commissioners, has caused much disappointment to many, and excited the indignation of a few, of the inhabitants of the eastern colonies. It is felt that our interests in other lands have been sadly disregarded. Hitherto the language of strong but respectful remonstrance has been the only weapon used. Within the last few days, however, the question has assumed a new phase. In a letter addressed to the editor of the Argus, Mr. Edward Wilson suggests that the worst of the convicts whose terms have expired, and ticket-of-leave holders who may have escaped from Western Australia and Van Dieman's Land, should be shipped to England at the expense of private individuals. Already promises of liberal pecuniary co-operation on the part of some of our wealthiest citizens have been sent to Mr. Wilson. Several letters, embodying similar despatches, have been sent to the Argus and one millionnaire undertakes to send to England, at his own expense, six "expired" convicts every month.

The four desperadoes who attempted to rot the bank in Collingwood have been tried and convicted. The two who were caught in the act have been sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment; the two others have escaped from Western Australia and Van Dieman's Land, should be shipped to England at the expense of private individuals. The members walked in procession to Paddington-green, and thence proceeded by railway to Willesden, where arrangements had been made for sports and amusements of all kinds.

The fifth half-yearly meeting of the United Kingdom Railway Officers and Servants' Accident Assurance Company was held last week at the London Bridge House Hotel. The receipts had been £1468 for the six months, and, after payments for accidents and expenses, the balance in hand amounted to £612. The sum of £1400 had been paid for deaths of members and their families, and £68 for accidents to members. The report was unanimously adopted, with the association, was established. A special meeting was afterwards held, to take into consideration some alterations in the rules.

In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1854-63 the average number (corrected) was 1852.—The deaths in years 1854-63 in the ten weeks in which the cholera prevailed in 1854 in London, which had ranged between 1000 and 1200 weekly, rose in 1854 to the unusual number of 2477 on Saturday. The average number of deaths in the three-sixty-eight weeks of the ten years, 1854-63, was 1000, exclusive of deaths registered in the cholera years in 1854, and with a correction for increase of population, 1121. Last week the deaths registered were 1139, or 18 more than the average in the first week of August, when the deaths from it were 286; in the last week of that month they were 189, and next week 152. On the 21st inst., being St. Matthew's Day, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Sheriffs will attend Divine service at Christ Church, Newgate-street, where a sermon will be preached by the Rev. W. Ainger, M.A., Head Master of the Charterhouse and late Fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge; after which they will proceed to the hall of Christ's Hospital to hear the orations delivered by the senior scholars, according to annual custom. Bovell, fourth Grecian; Latin elegiacs, from "Goldsmith's Deserted Village," Sixth Grecian; Greek hexameters, from "Paradise Lost," J. E. Hewison, sixth Grecian. There Latin elegiacs, from "Goldsmith's Deserted Village," Sixth Grecian. There will also be two original poems in Latin and in English, not adjudged.

A public meeting, connected with the Working Men's Shakspeare Memorial Committee, was held on Wednesday night, at the Whittington Club, chiefly for the purpose of explaining the objects and progress of the movement. Mr. Bainbridge moved the following resolution:—"That the carrying out of the objects of the society is a token of Shakspeare by a general penny subscription amongst the working classes." It had been proposed to the committee to commence the movement by asking the hearts of the people; but he, for one, should like to see some outward manifestation of that inward feeling, and to erect, and therefore, as the motto ran, be supported the present movement. Mr. G. L. Banks seconded the resolution, which was supported by Mr. Cowden Clarke, editor of Bell's Bunder, in some eminently practical remarks, and unanimously agreed to. Mr. Emanuel moved "That the public be appealed to for small subscriptions in aid of the movement." Mr. Howell seconded the resolution. He hoped the readers would take a pride in subscribing. Mr. Shirley Brooks supported the resolution, paying a tribute to the genius of the departed bard as a philosopher to the human race. The resolution was carried unanimously. The meeting was afterwards addressed by Messrs. G. Cruikshank, Wheeler, and others.

The church of St. Mary Magdalene, Munster-square, was crowded on Sunday morning, it having been announced that "Brother Ignatius" would preach the service. When the bell ceased about twenty surplices—choristers and others—took their stations, but no University hoods. Then followed up the whole vestried train of the rector, full fourteen strong, including some Mr. Stuart habited in the cope of full length, stole, and hood which are different in every respect from the Master of Arts's academical dress, but ordinarily worn by a priest of the Church of England as the insignia of the office of his order. The cope was richly embroidered, the ornamentation deep at the back forming a spindle-shape which extended from the shoulders at the back forming a spindle-shape which extended from the shoulders to the middle of the back, and also in front. Prior to the entrance of the procession, from his vestries namely, which are on the north side of the church, there were two huge candles (between which was placed a crucifix) lighted on the altar. A prayer-book was placed on the altar. A young boy supplied and knelt during the service. Mr. Stuart pronounced the so-called "Absolution" standing on the steps of the altar, and not in the sentence; then the thurible, or censer, in which the incense was burned and in which it was fanned, was handed to Mr. Stuart, who fanned it. Mr. Stuart took from the "thurible," or attendant, and waved it in the air, the usual operation was then performed in a very fine swung it in the air, the usual operation was then performed in a very fine manner by the priests before whom were officiating at the altar became for a moment the priests before whom were officiating at the altar became for a moment the time enveloped in a dense cloud of incense. Mr. Stuart then intoned the Creed, which he called the "Te Deum" with much solemnity. When the sermon was announced, Brother Ignatius was again honoured with the usual gospel of the day was read or intoned. During the recital he (although not the gospel was read or intoned. During the recital he (although not the gospel of the day) censed the congregation, and also the altar at the end of the Nicene Creed which he called the "Thurible," or attendant, and waved it in the air by the Holy Ghost." At the close of the ante-communion service Mr. Stuart censed the altar at the cross on the north side of the altar, then the sacrament, and stripped himself of his ecclesiastic vestment, leaving on the alb which he had on when he first entered the vestries. Brother Ignatius was then called upon to preach the sermon. His text, but very different from the ordinary clerical surplice, and with a gentle cassock, was "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." He said, in the course of his sermon, that he was not a priest, but one of the laymen of our Lord's admission to residence. He were also an embroidered gown and stole crossed over his breast, and he would not call himself priest and said—"Brother Ignatius tells me that he has got a new throat and cannot speak here to-day. I am sorry for it, because we have come here, probably, for the purpose of hearing him. It is not my fault. Before I gave you notice last Sunday morning that Brother Ignatius would preach, I received a distinct assurance from him that nothing should hinder him from coming here, and Brother Ignatius thinks a promise to be binding, and there is my opinion about his sore throat. When I called him to preach here last summer, and engaged to give him what might amount to, I think, rather about £100 being raised, he had no sore throat; but, as the officers collecting the money to be for the benefit of the Church of England, and poor Brother Ignatius has got a sore throat. Now, as some have, no doubt, come to hear Brother Ignatius, I will not detain you any two to allow those who like to leave the church to go. Those who like to remain I shall be, of course, glad to see. In the meantime Brother Ignatius will preach." About three minutes elapsed, and as no one seemed disposed to move, Mr. Stuart proceeded, stating that he would now read the Nicene Creed and the Ephesians, verses 22 and 23—"And gave him to be the head over all things to the Church. He said that Brother Ignatius was not a priest, and could not do Brother Ignatius, which existed before Brother Ignatius, and would exist after Brother Ignatius, and whether he had a sore throat or not, he could not do the morning of one of those things, which was the Church of Christ. At the close of the sermon Mr. Stuart went to the altar, and, in the usual way, read the Eucharistic vestments, and proceeded to the administration of the holy sacrament, which he served to the congregation.

LAW AND POLICE.—At the COURT of Bankruptcy, on Tuesday, a first meeting was held under the bankruptcy of Mr. Paul Beaden, the executive. At the Middlesex Sessions, Joseph Pinnis, a foreigner, was summoned to serve on the jury, but pleaded in excuse that he was not able to speak English, and had to feed with his mouth 500 young pheasants, and if he were engaged as a juryman they would die directly, as there was no other man in this country who could feed them as he could. Mr. Payne excused him on the ground of his being unable to speak English.

The inquest on the two Wreschloff women, Beckenham and Gubbins, found dead in a house at Hile-end, has resulted in a verdict, arrived at through the partially insane state of the bodies, to the effect that they died from the effects of cupidity of persuasion, but how or by whom administered the evidence did not show.

A shocking discovery has been made at Chelsea. About three weeks ago a man, named Moss, lost his unfurnished house, he occupying with his three sisters. Little was seen of the women, and latterly the landlord noticed that a strong effluvium emanated from the room. Yesterday this was all explained. George Augustus King, the man who accused himself of having been concerned with Mr. Bernard, the murder of Mr. Briggs, was brought up on Wednesday, at the Worship-street Police Court. No further evidence was produced in support of the charge preferred against him, and Mr. Mansfield Arnes, in contradiction of it, stated that King was at his house from eight o'clock on the evening of the murder to nine o'clock the next morning, and that, therefore, he could not have been a party to the crime. The magistrate, however, refused to discharge the prisoner until Miller should arrive, and accordingly remanded him for three days.

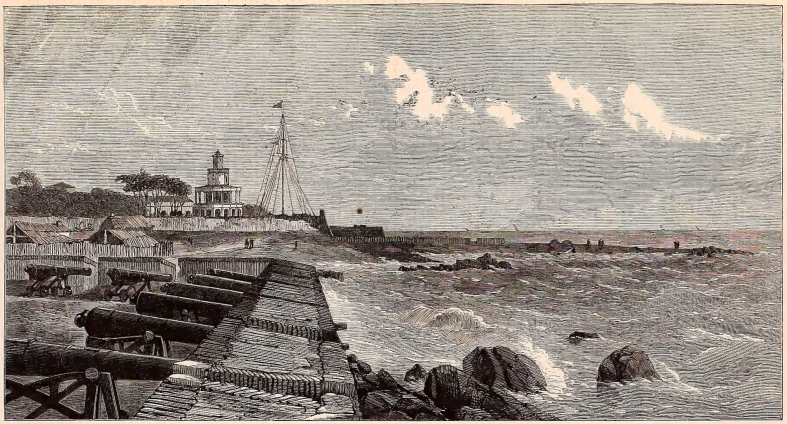
THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION AT BATH.



THE INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

The thirty-fourth annual meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science was opened, at Bath, on Wednesday, the number of visitors in Bath has been very large, and the number of tickets issued gives favourable promise that the meeting will be a most successful one. At one o'clock the general committee met in the Guildhall, and received the report of the council. The names of the officers of the different sections were appointed. The inaugural meeting of the Association was held in the theatre at eight o'clock in the evening. The building was crowded, and among those present were some of the most distinguished scientific men in Europe. Sir William Armstrong, the President, having resigned the office of president, the opening address was delivered by the new President, Mr. Hugh Falconer, who, after some remarks on the locality in the position of the waters for which Bath has long been renowned, and to the physical phenomena on which the study of geology throws such light, referred to the subject, in the discussion of which he has taken a prominent part, the learned President said—

"The more we study and comprehend the geographical changes of the glacial period, and the migrations of animals and plants to which it gave rise, the higher our conceptions are raised of the duration of that subdivision of time, which, as measured by the succession of events, must be considered unsurpassed in it, was brief, if estimated by the ordinary rules of geological classification. The glacial epoch was, in fact, a mere episode in the later geographies of the earth's history; for the inhabitants of the lands and seas, which existed during the great development of coal, were not very unlike the same. As yet we have no satisfactory proof that man existed in Europe or elsewhere during the glacial epoch, although the light of discovery may at any hour cast still in their infancy. In no early portion of the post-glacial period which we have yet explored in Europe; and in Egypt, where the signs of his existence, from the historical ages to those immediately antecedent, and to which we can assign a certain date, he is found to approach a dissimilar geographical state of things, when the climate was more humid, and the valley of the Nile rather imperfectly reclaimed from that which now prevails. Archeologists are satisfied that in central Europe the age of bronze succeeded that of stone, and that the age of iron in turn prior to the Swiss-lake dwellings of the bronze age were those of the stone period, which, however, may have come down to have been of about the same date; but what Europe and the nations around it were in the south of France was probably not unlike the condition of Africa under equal climate. Of that highest archeological grade of Amiens and Abbeville, and which has been assigned to the glacial epoch, because of extinct animals which were mingled in the same gravel with the implements, Between the present era and the elephant, rhinoceros, tiger, and hyena. Between the present era and that of these extinct vertebrates there is a great interval of time, during which many successive generations of unicornuous rivers which once flowed have through caverns have been occupied by a species of wild animals now wholly disappeared. Over the bed of the sea, moreover, has in the same ages been lifted up, in many places, hundreds of the beaches we see now in the British Islands, which are entirely altered. MM. De Verneuil and Louis Lartet have recently found in the province of Murcia, in the Spanish peninsula, the bones

EMBARKING OXEN AT TAMATAVE, MADAGASCAR.

A SKETCH by Lieutenant S. P. Oliver, R.A., engraved below, shows the mode of putting cattle on shipboard in a port of Madagascar, which does a considerable trade in live beef. The ox is there commonly represented by the variety called "zébu," or the Indian ox (bos Indicus), which is remarkable chiefly for the enormous dorsal hump and the membranous folds of skin about its dewlap. On the coast, however, the ox is not yet abundant. The province of Ankova, in the centre of the island, is the only district where cattle are bred and domesticated on a large scale. It is from this province solely that the islands of Mauritius and Réunion are provisioned with beef. It exports 30,000 head of cattle in the year. These cattle are driven from the highlands of Ankova, down the steep passes of Angavo, across the river Mangoro, to the plains of Ankay, where they are allowed to recruit themselves on a magnificent pasturage before traversing the dense forests of Ankanasatra. It is interesting, though rather inconvenient, to meet one of these vast herds in some of the precipitous watercourses or ravines, which in many places form the only path. Some of these places are so steep that the marmittes, or herdsmen, have to force the cattle, one ox after another, over the edge, where they slip and slide, and tumble and roll, and so reach the bottom somehow. In some places there are regular slides over the sticky clay, only interrupted by the deep holes made by the animals' feet when they pull themselves up by sticking their hoofs well into the soft mud. After passing the forests, the herds of oxen proceed by easy stages to the coast, near Tamatave, where they remain in the neighbourhood of that port until they are required for the Mauritius or Bourbon traders. All the oxen are sold in front of the battery of Thomasina, the head-quarters of the Governor of Tamatave, a great cattle owner, who is said to have bought his present position with the money he had acquired by successful bullock trading. Andriamandroso (that is his name), or one of his deputies, usually attends the sale; and none are allowed to be sold under fifteen dollars a head, out of which a royalty is paid to the representative of the Madagascar Government for the revenue of her Majesty Queen Rasoahery (literally "The Strong-minded"). The master of the "bullocker" (the slang name for the vessels engaged in this traffic) has previously arranged with the Hova traders for the conveyance of such a number as he can receive on board—from eighty to 200, perhaps, in one vessel. The lot bought, with a few extra, are driven into some strong cattle-pens near Hastie Point, on the night before the ship is ready for sea; and early the next morning the embarkation takes place. The vessel having approached the shore as near as is practicable, a hawser is passed ashore. A large canoe is prepared, with pieces of timber lashed across as outriggers (sometimes they have two canoes lashed together), and this lies just outside the rollers, or breakers, on the beach. The bullocks and oxen are driven into the surf and made to swim to the canoe, where their horns are lashed to the outrigger; and as soon as the canoe has a number of them fast lashed and swimming alongside, she is hauled along the hawser and brought alongside the vessel, where the oxen are slung and hauled on board. It is very amusing to see the cattle driven into the sea. They are first caught with a noose thrown round their horns whilst yet in the pen; ropes are made fast to the head of the first comer, and, the gate of the cattle-pen being opened, he rushes out. If he be an obstreperous animal he causes great sport: first, he makes a rush at the nearest persons, but is speedily hauled off by the rope; then he tries to turn back, but he is assailed from behind with kicks, and sticks, and goads; at last he rushes to the water, but, just as they think he is going in all right, he dashes back again in their faces. When they are once got off their legs in deep water the animals are powerless, and are speedily lashed tight, swimming with their nostrils just above water. For the information of our graziers and butchers, we state the dimensions of a fat Madagascar bullock which was a gift from the late King of Madagascar to the English Commandant in the Mauritius:—Height, from top of hump to the ground, 5 ft. 8 in.; from back of hump to ground, 4 ft. 9 in.; girth behind the hump, 7 ft. 8½ in.; round the base of hump, 6 ft.; round the top of hump, 2 ft. 6 in.; round the loins, 7 ft. 5½ in.; length of the animal, from extreme of buttock to tip of nose, 7 ft. 2 in.; from back of hump to tail, 3 ft. 1 in.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1864.

THE tercentenary year is not to expire without our witnessing another attempt to "do something in honour of Shakspeare." The London affair having come to a lugubriously-disgraceful end and the Stratford celebration (which, malgré a whole chapter of accidents, was successful as a fête) having involved the promoters in a debt to liquidate which the hat is being sent round, the working classes, as they are affectedly called, have a subscription started to Shakspeare by a memorial is proposed to be erected by a penny subscription. That is to say, those who can afford a penny only may honour Shakspeare to that amount; but no coin will be refused, and, indeed, increased liberality is invited by the intimation that, whereas a penny subscriber is to have only a work of Shakspeare's autograph-stamp as a receipt for his donation, "memorial cards" and other treasures are to be bestowed upon the donors of silver. Money-boxes are to be placed in various parts of the metropolis for the convenience of those who desire to do Shakspeare honour by giving a penny; and it is to be a penny collection, which latter feature of the scheme many persons will be inclined to regard as a nuisance.

What is the fatality that attaches to every attempt to gild the refined gold of Avon—to hoist a twopenny flag on the starry-pointing pyramid of Shakspeare's fame? The world has long since raised to the greatest of poets? Here is a new effort, on which the word "Sham" is at once graven by its own promoters. They propose to call their erection a "Working Men's Memorial," and the very first thing they do is to announce that they cannot rely upon the contributions of working men themselves, but not only to invite, but to demand, the aid of the richer orders. Therefore the monument, even if it be raised, will not be a working men's memorial. Nor are "working men," in the sense of the foolish word—foolish, because professional persons and tradesmen are working men—to have the case as hard as the mechanic—the promoters of the movement. The chairman at the meeting last reported was a political lecturer; one of the speakers was a tragedian of eminence, another was a literary man, and a third was a distinguished artist. The matter which was the chief subject for congratulation was the fact that Mr. Gladstone had become a subscriber, and the next was a letter from one of our actresses of the highest class, who also inclosed her donation. What have the London mechanics to do with a movement in this pretentious?

To the scheme itself there can be no objection whatever, beyond the fact that nothing has occurred during two centuries to show that Milton was wrong in declaring that Shakspeare needed no monument. We have in London three statues of the poet—two, four, if we count the one at the very portico of Drury-lane Theatre; and there is no reason why a fifth should not be set up on Primrose-hill. But let the effort be made in a frank and truthful manner. We have no idea of accusing the promoters of any desire for self-glorification. There was a great deal of this kind of thing attaching to the original London scheme, and the public detected it at once and laughed at the plan. But we believe that those who are now engaged in trying to get up the working men's memorial are honest in their intention; that they have a great reverence for Shakspeare; and that they think a memorial of the tercentenary ought to be set up. Why sail under false colours? If they have deceived themselves into the notion that Shakspeare worship is as prevalent among the working classes that they will gladly unite in raising his statue, why not try the experiment fairly. We dare say they will obtain a great many pennies from the class which earns high wages and is never niggardly when it has money to spend. A penny is but half the price of the glass of ale which members of that class are ever ready to bestow on one another on the slightest provocation and from the smallest service. Two strangers accidentally meet on London Bridge and look at the boats. One remarks to the other that there is a deal of traffic going on. The other responds to the profound observation, "Ay, that there is." Then they go and refresh themselves together: the little drama is reported in a tap-room case where witnesses come before a police court. The other night a station clerk, with a courtesy so remarkable that it ought to be noted, told a man who was buying a ticket to make haste, as there were no later trains. The traveller expressed his regret that he must hurry, or he would have rewarded the strange civility of the clerk with liquid. We repeat that nobody can be more open-handed than the mechanic when he has money. We do not believe that he takes any violent interest in Shakspeare; but he will give his penny if he is asked for it. Why do not the promoters of the Shakspeare Memorial go to the pub in whose name they propose to set up a statue? If it is to be raised in the way now suggested, it will be Mr. Gladstone's, and Miss Faucit's, and Mr. Cruikshank's statue, partly paid for by the pennies of mechanics; and it will not be a true thing, or the true exponent of a sentiment.

But, as we have said, we believe in the honest intentions and loyalty of the promoters of the memorial; and, as it is the most hopeful of all the schemes for doing honour to the poet, because it is last tainted with self-seeking, we should like it to succeed, if the sham part of the business were cleared away. Call it the London Memorial, if you will, or the Primrose-hill Memorial, or by some title that shall not involve untruth. If it be desired to make the class subscription distinct from the rest—an unwise course, and, moreover, one which will give no true results—separate the penny list from that of the silver and gold. But do not call the thing a working men's affair, and then solicit Chancellors of the Exchequer to help to pay for it. This is the only objection we have to make to the new scheme. Of one thing we are certain — namely, that there will be no ridiculous and shameful revelation in connection with the funds, like that which the Stratford balance-sheet gives out. After being dinned to death with the statements that the "profession" (the actors) had come forward in the most enthusiastic manner to honour the great head of their craft, and after being disgusted with their jealousies and quarrels, we now read that the cost of hiring and feeding "the profession" for the few days of the festival was £2235 15s. 10d. That is the price at which the co-operation of the actors was obtained in doing honour to the head of the Drama. The memorial likely to last as long as anything connected with the tercentenary.

THE COURT.

The Queen, with the junior members of the Royal family, continues at Balmoral Castle, in the enjoyment of good health.

On Tuesday week her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Helena and the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, drove to Loch Bulig, and thence to Inchrory, returning by Tomahoish and Gairn Shiel. Mr. Morier arrived at the castle, and had the honour of dining with the Queen.

On Wednesday week her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Louisa and the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, drove to the Lynn of Quoich. Later in the day the Queen, attended by Lady Ely and Major Hodge, Princess Helena, attended by the Hon. Harriet Phipps, drove to Birkhall.

On Thursday week the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena and the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, drove to Chamounix. Princess having been previously met Birkhall from Balmoral, her Majesty and their Royal Highnesses mounted and rode up Glenquoich nearly to the pine forest of the Bracban, which is proximate to the foot of Ben Gaurd, where the Royal party partook of luncheon, and afterwards enjoyed a walk through the wild and picturesque district of Glenquoich, emerging via Mar Lodge into the Lynn of Dee, when a brief stay was made in order to view the unique beauty of the scenery surrounding the Falls. The journey was continued thence via Braemar. Horses were changed at the Invercauld Arms Hotel, where a large number of persons had assembled, who warmly greeted the Queen by graciously responding to their salutations. After a few minutes the route was resumed, and Balmoral was reached at half-past six o'clock.

Yesterday week the Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, walked in the grounds. Later in the day her Majesty drove in the vicinity of Balmoral.

On Saturday last the Queen, accompanied by Princess Helena, drove to Ai to Dochnacarn and visited Mrs. Dan Lock. Sir Charles Wood left the castle.

On Sunday the Queen, Princess Helena, and the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha attended Divine service in the parish church of Crathie. The Rev. Stephen Renfrew officiated.

On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louisa, walked and drove in the castle grounds. Later in the day her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and Princess Beatrice, drove in the neighbourhood of Balmoral. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha went deerstalking in the forest of Glenmore.

Lord Russell has arrived at the castle as Secretary of State in attendance upon the Queen.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have enjoyed perfect retirement since their arrival at Frederiksborg Castle. The Princess and the infant Prince Albert Victor of Wales, the Regius of the Royal House, are both but little inconvenienced. The weather, according to the latest accounts, has been unfavourable, with continuous rain falling.

The birthday of the Queen of Denmark was celebrated privately at Frederiksborg on Wednesday week. The Princess of Wales remained resident in the castle and the members of the Corps Diplomatique had the honour of being received and of tendering their congratulations. In the evening there was a dinner party, at which about forty guests were present. The circle included the members of the Danish Royal family at present at the castle in honour of the Prince and Princess, Sir Augustus and Lady Paget, Mr. Gosling, and Mr. Scott of the British Embassy, the suite of the Prince and Princess, and the Commander and Captains of the British Royal squadron. After dinner the Prince proposed the health of the Queen of Denmark, and immediately afterwards the King of Denmark proposed the health of Queen Victoria. The company then separated, the remainder of the evening being passed in private.

On Saturday last the Prince and Princess, accompanied by the members of the Danish Royal family, drove in open carriages to Elsinore and visited the Castle of Kronborg. After inspecting the castle and the fortifications their Royal Highnesses proceeded on board the Osborne, which conveyed them to Humblebek, where the Danish fleet was anchored at a point of the Sound wider than at Elsinore. The Prince and Princess were received with the usual salutes, and, after steaming round the squadron, their Royal Highnesses received the principal officers of the fleet on board the Osborne. The Royal party returned to Fredensborg at eight o'clock. The Prince and Princess were warmly greeted by the inhabitants of Elsinore, and the streets were decorated with flags.

On Sunday, at the request of the Princess, Divine service was performed at Fredensborg Castle by the Rev. Mr. Sandham, chaplain to the Royal Highness for the title of confirmation.

On Wednesday the Prince and Princess left Fredensborg for Bernstorf, whither they arrived at six o'clock. A triumphal arch was erected, and national airs were played. An address was read by the clergyman of the parish. The King of Denmark returned thanks on behalf of the Prince and Princess. A large concourse of people were assembled, who heartily cheered the Royal Highnesses.

The Prince and Princess are expected to visit Stockholm at the end of the month, at the invitation of the King of Sweden.

PRINCE ALFRED.

Her Majesty's ship Racoon, with Prince Alfred on board, arrived in the Firth of Forth from Norway early on Tuesday, and anchored in Burntisland Roads. The Prince went ashore at seven o'clock, and proceeded by the first train for the north en route for Balmoral. It is stated that his Royal Highness will proceed to the Cape of Good Hope, and study a year at the University in which the Prince Consort passed a portion of his youth.

PRINCE HUMBERT.

Prince Humbert, Crown Prince of Italy, accompanied by Prince Napoleon and Princess Clotilde (Prince Humbert's sister), arrived at Southampton from Paris on Saturday last, in the Imperial yacht Jean Sasseleen's yacht. His Royal Highness was received upon his arrival by the Italian Minister and the principal members of the suite. The Prince passed the night in his yacht, and proceeded to London, viâ the Lavinia and South-Western Railway to the Nine Elms terminus, whence the Prince drove to the residence of the Italian Legation in Grosvenor-street. At two o'clock Viscount Palmerston paid a visit to his Royal Highness at the Legation. The Foreign Minister, the French Chargé-d'Affaires, and other members of the Corps Diplomatique, with the Consular General of Italy, called upon the Prince. Subsequently his Royal Highness visited the Zoological Society's Gardens, Regent's Park, and afterwards drove through the parks. In the evening the Prince honoured Viscountess and Viscount Palmerston with his company at dinner at Cambridge House.

On Tuesday the Prince left London by the quarter-past nine o'clock train on the Great Northern Railway, for Doncaster.

One of the vacant Garters has been conferred on the Marquis of Lansdowne. Lord Lovat will have the vacant ribbon of the Thistle. Lord Harewood will be the new Knight of the Bath.

Their Royal Highnesses the Count and Countess of Paris have arrived at Inveligreich, in North Germany, on a visit to the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin.

The Duchess (Dowager) of Sutherland and Lord Albert Leveson arrived at Stafford House, on Tuesday, from their seat in Ireland.

The Earl of Dalkeith has arrived in Scotland from the Continent.

Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston have left Cambridge House for Brambledene, Hants.

CHURCH AND UNIVERSITIES.

A new church, dedicated to All the Saints, is to be erected in the Pimlerico and Alma roads, for the use of the inhabitants of Clifton, and the works will be proceeded with without delay.

A handsome silver inkstand and an elegant writing-case have been given to the Rev. J. C. Flach, Chaplain at Frankfort, by the young persons prepared by him for the confirmation recently held in that city.

The foundation-stone of a new church, to be called St. Silas, was laid by Dr. M'Neile at Liverpool on Tuesday. The church is situated in Toxteth Park. The money for the erection has been provided by the Doctor's congregation at St. Paul's, Prescot Park.

The foundation-stone of a new church was laid on Wednesday week at Gosport, by Mr. Preston, M.P. The church will be built in the Early Norman style, and will accommodate about 600 persons. It will be consecrated Easter.

Among the gifts presented on the occasion were two specimens of the raw material of the district, a piece of coal and of ironstone.

The appeal made to the public at the recent meetings held at Leicester, Warwick, and Northampton, in the interest of Nonconformity, has resulted in a liberal sum being raised towards the completion of the restoration of this cathedral. The amount promised or required, in addition to the £30,000 already spent, is £22,000, and one half of that amount has been subscribed. The estimate of Mr. Gilbert Scott, of Bristol, for the restoration of the tower, has been accepted, and the work will be proceeded with forthwith.

There was a good deal of excitement at Claybrook, in Leicestershire, on Sunday. Bishop Colenso had been announced to preach there, but the Bishop of Peterborough, however, intervened, and inhibited the Rev. Mr. Johnson, the Vicar, and the Rev. Mr. Wright, the Curate, from permitting the Lord's Bishop of Natal to officiate. The inhibition was obeyed, but the Rev. Lewis Wood took the opportunity of reading from the pulpit Dr. Colenso's sermon, and in the evening the Lord Bishop himself delivered an address to a large number of people on the village green.

The Archbishops of Canterbury, York, Armagh, and Dublin have issued an address, on behalf of themselves and the vice-presidents of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, addressed, "To our beloved brethren in Christ, the clergy and laity of the United Church of England and Ireland," on the Church work in the colonies and dependencies of the British Crown. Their Graces, in addressing the clergy, give utterance to the following words:—"The Bishops of Calcutta, Colombo, Grahamstown, Orange River Settlement, Honolulu, Labuan, Sierra Leone, Gambia, the Bishop of Natal, and many others of the missionary bishops, are also members of the Archbishops' Council. The Archbishop says:—'We earnestly and affectionately entreat you to make use next year of the first offer for a large and more general appeal.' Bishop Gray, Speaking in the name of the vice-presidents of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, gives specially for this purpose the following reasons:—'That we do not limit our sympathies to it. We are convinced that in no other way can the work of the Church in the colonies be put on a permanent and secure existence, raising its own contributions for the work; and we therefore beseech you that this year the Sunday appointed for the purpose receive a collection for Church of England missions; and we pray our brethren of the laity to help them, not only by their contributions, but by their co-operation, but by becoming regular subscribers, if they are not such at present, or, if living away, by becoming new sons of Christian ministry and so to add to the funds of the societies they support, and by forming themselves into associations for the more complete effecting of this great work."

The expedition is under the leadership of Dr. Robert Brown, of Edinburgh, who has made himself favourably known in Victoria by a journey which he performed recently on foot from Port Phillip Heads in a gun-boat to the mouth of the Gwydhun river, from which place he returned to Melbourne overland.

At the last meeting of the Entomological Society the letters and papers addressed to Mr. Stevenson, executor of Mr. Curtis, have been brought before the notice of the members by Mr. Tegetmeier. These letters afford a curious illustration of the difficulties encountered by those who, destitute of either scientific or practical value. Several of the most erroneous statements have been made over and over again, and have misled even the students of derelore lengthier. The object with which these letters were brought before the notice of the members of the Entomological Society was that entomologists and agriculturists that they represent the state of practical to enable them to form a correct estimate of the value of Mr. Curtis's labours.

The Russian fleet has just been strengthened by the addition of a magnificent armour-plated frigate, the Minin, launched at Archangel in the Cronstadt docks on the 24th ult. The Scrastopol is stated to be one of the largest and most powerful vessels of her class afloat, and will shortly be nearly equals the Black Prince and Warrior in her dimensions, and far exceeds them in the weight of her armour-plating. The Minin's plates are measures 600 ft. in length, and her greatest breadth is 52 ft. 3 in. When ready for sea, she will draw 26 ft. 6 in. of water. Her armour-plates will be 4½ in. thick, fastened to a double coating of teak backed by iron. The armament will consist of 36 guns, all of the most recent pattern, and she will be armed with steel guns of the greatest calibre.

Mariners are therefore cautioned, when approaching Cork Harbour at night, to keep eastward of the limits of the fixed white light until they have passed the rock. Also, that the fog bell lately erected at Roche Point will in future be sounded eight times in a minute during thick or foggy weather."

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Not to battle entirely the desires of those who, like Mr. Croaker in Goldsmith's capital comedy, depend mainly upon what news they get for their excitement of the day, as other matters wane in interest, the exciting chase and capture of a murderer has come into prominence. It is true that we have had other horrors supplied us by the papers; and the wealthy prophesies—one of whom, by-the-way, is a notable disciple of the renowned "Zadkiel"—have, greatly to their own astonishment, found themselves in a corner of the Times, figuring prominently away before an admiring but incredulous audience. We have only to become just a shade more dull, and, for lack of news, we shall be compelled to let Mr. Croaker's pleasant way of amusing himself:—"What if I bring you my last letter to the Gazetteer on the increase and progress of earthquakes? It will amuse us, I promise you. I there prove how the late earthquake is coming round to pay us a visit from London to Lisbon, from Lisbon to the Canary Isles, from the Canary Islands to Palmyra, from Palmyra to Constantinople, and from Constantinople to Paris, and so on again, and so on!" There is nothing now under the sun, here, Croaker, you see, ninety-six years ago, that is not the property of earthquakes; and here are we frightening ourselves with the saddest forebodings of perpetual ruin and misery, more especially when we have no Parliamentary orator whose speech we may criticise or whose absence we may laugh at.

Talking about oratory, what a display was that in New York the other day on the extradition case of Herr Franz Müller! How admirably logical was Mr. Chauncey Shafter, when we are told, once drew and discharged a pistol at the presiding Judge, just to bring him to a speedy and pleasant decision on the side of the state counsel! What a grand deal of "reasoning" the American populace will hear! Because, forsooth, an American counsel chooses to assert that England and the United States are in a "state of nature," a state of war" a man, in whose possession the last and watch of a murdered man were found, and to whom the watch-chain was traced, and whose own coat was stained with blood, is not to be given up to stand a fair trial! Even the Commissioner hesitated, and "wished" he could only find a precedent to support his unbiassed decision, and alas! felt "constrained" to give the man up!

The visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Denmark, surely a very natural one, and one which, of course, could not be the occasion of these political gentlemen who see a meaning in everything, and who, in consequence, rarely have been favourable after the young couple, and the result is, that we have a very interesting second act of the Schleswig-Holstein drama now enjoying the blessings of peace after a humiliating defeat at the hands unprovoked attack. One of the best French papers, adverting to the humiliation of Denmark, says that the nation could not be in a more black in history. Poland butchered and Denmark crushed, without a single power having drawn a sword in favour of the principle of power and liberty in Europe." But in the midst of this mourning the King of Denmark, having wedded his eldest daughter to one of the Royal Princes of Europe, from which alliance a child has sprung, is now offered the next best alliance in Europe, in uniting her sister, Princess Dagmar, to the heir to the throne of Russia. At the same time we learn that the young King of Greece is betrothed to Princess Alexandra, daughter of England and Denmark will become united, and Denmark serve as a bond between them. The French see in the match a determination to prevent the Scandinavian Union which was talked of at Stockholm, and which was popular enough at Copenhagen; and other Continental politicians find nothing better than to attribute the part of Russia in the affair "to prevent the guardian of the Baltic Sea from throwing herself into the arms of England." But the Emperor Napoleon's Secretary has not his finger in the pie; he has made such a muddle of the foreign affairs and has so degraded England by his forcibly-feeble policy, that it will be wise for us to abstain from fishing in troubled waters.

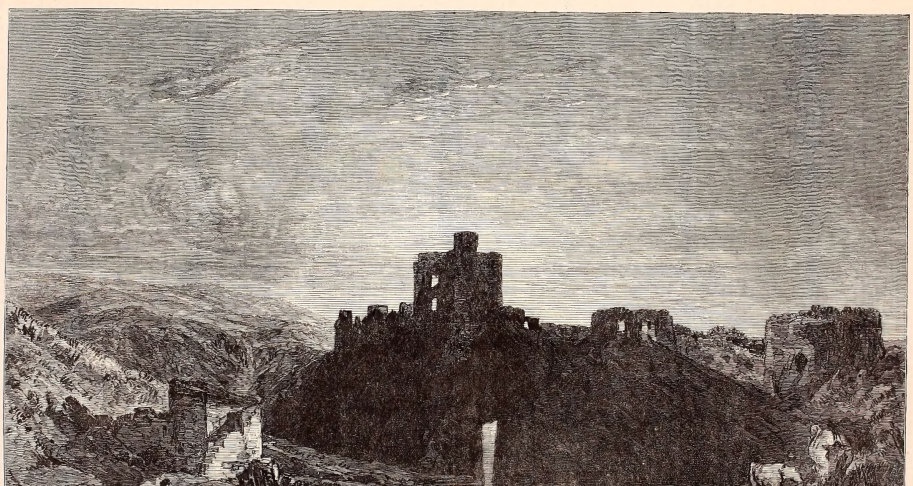
There was, some time ago, a pretty little paragraph in the American papers, which our own journals extracted as a specimen of ghastly ingenuity. It was simply a statement how many trees in the United States, piled to the height of twenty-five feet, and being thirty-five feet thick, could be made out of the timber in the "virgin forests" of the Federal civil war, appropriating, by-the-way, a name which Lor l Clarendon has applied to the United States ages ago in his own way. The next step in mathetical exercise was to assert that "seventy-five thousand tons of human blood had been spilled on Dixie's soil," a fact of which another American paper disposed of by saying supposing that a man of war had to have "spilled" more or less of that fluid, they would have averaged the loss of about seventy gallons a piece! Considering the fate of the "Arithmetical Copperhead" who made the fallacious calculation above, we should fear such tremendous figures as these, and those who are about to emigrate to the State of Texas in the North, as they will be and are, "On the National Debt of Great Britain," says the New York World, "it is yearly interest charge is 1 for 262 dollars of property; but for America, whose property is very much less, it is 1 for 20 dollars of property. Our debt is not one half times larger than the debt of Great Britain; and when they come to examine the difference of the currency, with gold at 2.60, our debt, says the calculator, will be more than four times larger than the debt of Great Britain!" Now, this is a pretty state of matters to have arrived at in three short years! Every one may quote figures, and say that, if this makes the foolish stare, it cannot but make the judicious grieve. Such calculations are all very well, provided that only one moiety to pay the taxes, for the property of the South is included in the above calculation, means the almost total exclusion of English goods and manufactures for years to come, and the worst of it is that the expenses are still running on, and, so far as we see, there is no end to the war, which has to stop them.

The great question of drinking the health of the Pope before that of the Queen has been of late debated very freely in our papers; and Lord Ashtown, who is a Roman Catholic, tells us that "the subject of the Pope" is as much superior to the "sphere of the Queen" as the attributes of creation are to those of the Creator. "Why, we are told no king but Cæsar" seems to be the cry of the Ultramontanists; and every letter that any one of them writes only exhibits more strongly to us the fact, urged by Lord Ashtown, that no man can be a true and loyal Catholic beehren a divided allegiance, an impossible to imagine. A notable Belgian Catholic writer says these Ultramontanes "make on the bones of a dolmens when he asserts that, if they drink the Pope's health "spiritually," it is a "monstrous nonsense, and equivalent to, if as a temporal prince it is treasonable; and that the Pope, good man, does not care about it. Nor the Queen either! Why not omit the two Potentates altogether? Is it quite right to drink to either there is a question of precedent? We like these little epistles observance and observance. Lord Ashtown is hard upon the bones of Ultramontane brethren. In the mean time certain brigands have frightened to death English ladies outside the very gates of Rome and Florence, and in Preston Goel we have such a terrible superfluity of Roman Catholic prisoners that, as an instrument of reformation thereat, they have been obliged to be released in many instances as incurable. No doubt, these extraordinary means will answer the end in view!

A new play of Mrs. Frances Anne Kemble will be produced on Monday at the Haymarket Theatre, which will be nothing less than a version of Dumas's piece, "Mille. de Belle Isle." The great Alexandre, having dramatised Shakespeare's "Cymbeline" and "The Moloniad" for the stage, is reaping awhile from his labours: the serio-comic account which he gave to the Emperor in his recent letter to him is worth reading.

The Times' Bee Master, Dr. Cumming, will, we hear, be subjected to a heavy action for damages upon the appearance of his new book, by a gentleman of considerable scientific acquirements. "By Jingo," cried Dennis the critic to his friends in the pit, as he was sitting at a play, "they won't act my tragedy, but they have stolen my thunder!" The talented gentleman had invented a theatrical thunder, just as Mr. Beecheroft has a patent flame for his fire in the "Streets of London," and he recognised its tone. It is sad for a man of science, whose patient investigation is but half concluded, to find some mistaken gentleman jump in before him and bolt away with his ideas.

Messrs. Moxon have found the demand for Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" so great that another printer one stationer can keep up with it. We hear that it is already printed abroad.



PHOTOGRAPHS OF TURNER'S "LIBER STUDIORUM."

THE true scope and proper function of photography have in nothing been more clearly displayed than in the various photographic reproductions of the works of Turner. It is a well-known fact that, from the very various degrees of actinic power in light of diverse colours, a photograph from any work of art or natural object in which variety of colour is a prominent characteristic must be full of relative untruthfulness and can scarcely be other than inharmonious. Hence, photographs from the oil pictures and water-colour drawings of Turner—in which not only diversity of local colour, but also the most subtle play and interchange of hues are most essential qualities—are to the last degree disappointing. It is not merely that we miss the charm of the exquisite colouring, but the composition—at least that important part of it depending on chiaroscuro—is altogether falsified. On the other hand, photographs from rare proof engravings after, or monochrome drawings by, Turner, in which (as through the medium of photography) colour does not interfere with the scale of gradation, are entirely satisfactory, and are, in reality, scarcely less valuable to the artist or amateur than the originals. For this reason photographs from Turner's "Liber Studiorum"—a collection which has only appeared in the form of sepia drawings or engravings thereof—possess, so to speak, a genuine documentary value to which no photographs from his oil paintings or drawings in colour can, with the least show of reason, lay claim.

From this famous work two sets of photographs have been published, the one from the original drawings, the other from the engravings executed from these drawings. It might at first seem probable that the advantage between the two reproductions would be wholly on the side of the former—i.e., the photographs from the original drawings. But this is not exactly the case. It should be remembered that Turner did not consider that his task was completed when he placed his drawings in the hands of the engravers. On the contrary, he bestowed unremitted attention on the engraver's progress, frequently altering, correcting, and making additions with his own hands. Consequently, there are some interesting afterthoughts and striking effects in the prints not to be found in the drawings. Moreover, as the plates wore, the painter made successive alterations; sometimes, when the plate was in a very bad state, actually reversing the entire effect. On the whole, however, the photographs from the original drawings, taken by Mr. Thurston Thompson (whose name alone is a sufficient guarantee of their excellence), and published by Messrs. Cundall and Downes, are by far the more estimable. In the first place, they are more important and generally more successful examples of photographic manipulation. But, over and above this, they have the very weighty recommendation of presenting facsimiles of the master's handiwork, not merely in part and through another medium, but wholly and directly.

The original drawings which form the "Liber Studiorum" are (including the frontispiece) seventy-one in number. The subscription-price for the series was £17 18s., but a good and complete copy now sells for 200 guineas. Mr. Stokes formed a "Liber Studiorum" collection, consisting of etchings, proofs, and many duplicates of each separate plate in every known state—a collection which was offered to the authorities of the South Kensington Museum for £2500, and afterwards brought, when sold in detail, £3000. As the means of placing a perfectly accurate reproduction, not merely of these now rare and costly plates, but of the still more precious original drawings after which they were executed, within the reach of persons of ordinary means, photography presents advantages which require no comment.

The great undertaking of publishing photographs from the drawings of the "Liber Studiorum" was commenced some three years ago. Fortunately for the lover of art and the student of Turner, the South Kensington Museum possesses fifty-one of the original drawings for the work, and photographs of these have for some time been before the public. We have selected from the two volumes composing this series two characteristic examples for engraving. To assert that our Engravings have the same kind of excellence as copies produced by the camera, would clearly amount to a self-contradiction. Yet it is quite possible for any work of artistic imitation to have its own peculiar merit, inasmuch as it may—within, of course, the limits of its means—evince a feeling for, and appreciation of, the qualities it seeks to translate. We submit to the reader that our artist has at all events indicated some of the leading characteristics of Turner's art and even his handiwork. In "The Stackyard" we see the painter's power of imparting interest to the humblest incidents and homeliest occupations of rustic life by judicious choice of the point of view, skilful composition and distribution of light and shade, and suggestive handling—the last noticeable especially in the masses of foliage. In the "Norham Castle" we are reminded of Turner's marvellous versatility. Although the cows drinking at evening, the boat, the, skiff, and hut, are as familiar and commonplace as any of the elements of the first-named drawing, yet every one must feel that this is as different in its dominant sentiment of solemn serenity and impressive repose as it is in its leading subject of a venerable, brave, and sturdy stronghold, preserving its dignity and grandeur, and even gaining in awfulness, in ruin and decay. This drawing illustrates, also, one of Turner's most favourite expedients for securing powerful effect, with a real perspective, in which he has never been approached. We allude to the placing of a tree or building immediately before or near to the source of light. A painter thus secures not only the power of accenting the mass and contour of the object so relieved in the most powerful way, but he obtains the utmost limit of effect by the opposition of his highest light and profoundest dark, and, by this mode of giving, so to speak, the extremities of his gamut, he enables the eye to be sensible of and measure the tenderest tones and semitones in other parts of the picture. We trust the reader will appreciate, by looking at our Engraving, the variety afforded by this artistic principle to the gradations throughout, and the luminous and aerial quality imparted to the sky. Of the appropriateness of relieving against the setting sun that frowning ruin and that watch-turret, which has seen the same sun sink beneath is for centuries, it would be idle to speak. To analyse the whole cycle—for we may so term it—of landscape-art comprised in the "Liber Studiorum" would be obviously impossible within the space at our command. In a former article we endeavoured to describe the general characteristics of the work and to recall the circumstances of its production. A few facts in connection with the latter are all that we can now venture to recapitulate. There can be no doubt, then, that the "Liber Studiorum" originated in that rivalry with Claude which during the earlier part of his career, actuated Turner, and that confessedly, in many instances. The causes which led to the compilation of Claude's "Liber Veritatis" were, however, widely different; and any comparison between the work of the ancient and modern master must be unfair to the former. Claude's drawings for his "Liber" were executed not for the public eye or the engravers, but as memoranda to identify the pictures he had produced. His early success brought him many fraudulent imitators as well as more honourable followers; and to guard his reputation he made drawings of every picture he produced in order to authenticate them; and these drawings, bound together, were hence called "Libri di Verita." There are said to have been six of these "Books of Truth," but only one is now in existence, and that is at Chatsworth. The drawings were admirably engraved in mezzotint by Earlom; and the exhibition of many of them at the Manchester Art-Treasures Exhibition of 1857 must have contributed to vindicate the master against some of the unjust depreciation of Mr. Ruskin. The diffusion of Earlom's and other engravings after Claude, added to the undue partiality of the aristocracy for "classical landscape," in all probability led to Turner's competing against Claude in designs for the engraver—a kind of work in which the English painter had previously met with more encouragement than for his oil pictures. Turner was engaged upon the "Liber Studiorum" at intervals from 1807 to 1816. To give some idea of the comprehensiveness of the scheme, the subjects were divided into six heads—viz., historical, pastoral, elegant pastoral, mountain, marine, and architectural. Several engravers were at various times engaged upon the task. The number of plates were to extend to one hundred; but, as we have said, it only reached seventy-one. The work is said not to have paid, and Turner discontinued it as soon as he began the "England and Wales" series.

"NORHAM CASTLE," FROM THE PHOTOGRAPHED EDITION OF THE "LIBER STUDIORUM," BY J. W. M. TURNER.

THE MILITARY SCHOOLS OF CANADA.

Our Illustration on page 289 represents the official military inspection at Toronto of the pupils of one of the schools lately established by the Canadian Government in connection with the militia of that province. The militia force of Canada is divided into three classes—the volunteer, the service, and reserve militia. The volunteers are organised in companies and battalions, according to circumstances, provided with arms and uniforms, and frequently drilled by means of an efficient staff of instructors from the regular army in the pay of the province. This force is organised and governed under a special act of the Legislature. The service and reserve or sedentary militia are regulated by a separate bill and classified as follows:—The service militia consists, 1st, of all unmarried men and widowers without children between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years; 2ndly, of all married men and widowers with children between the ages mentioned. The reserve men are those of forty-five and upwards, but under sixty years of age. The service men of the province thus represent the main element of the force of the country practically available for purposes of defence. The reserve or sedentary force is organised into battalions and companies, under the necessary officers, and consists of all those men of the class specified resident within certain prescribed limits. These and the corps of service men form the county battalions of the regiment. The service militia is balloted and organised under the provisions of the statute, and, as occasion may require, is liable, under the orders of the Commander-in-Chief, to be mustered into active service in the field.

No regular service of these men is required in time of peace. There existed, however, an urgent necessity for properly-qualified officers to command them in the event of their being called out. With this view schools of instruction were established, one in Upper and one in Lower Canada. These schools have been in operation since the 1st of March last; and their working has been so satisfactory that there seems to be a general desire to establish more such schools in both sections of the province. For this useful institution the province is indebted to Lord Monck, the Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief.

The military school of Upper Canada is conducted at Toronto, in the offices and grounds belonging to what was formerly the Government House. The staff consists of the Captain Commandant, who is Lieutenant-Colonel Peacock, commanding the 1st battalion of the 16th Regiment, stationed at Toronto; with Captain Carter, 16th Regiment, as Adjutant, one sergeant-major, and eight drill instructors. The latter are also from the regiment mentioned. Pupils are admitted by order of his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, upon a favourable report from the proper staff officer of militia for the regimental division of the applicant. After they have undergone a course of instruction and passed certain examinations, they may obtain certificates of proficiency, which are designated as of the second and of the first class, and which testify respectively to the fitness of the pupil to take command of a company or of a battalion. A second-class certificate must be obtained before a pupil will be allowed to continue and to try for a first-class; and no pupil is allowed to remain at the school for a longer period than three months. Fifty dollars gratuity, besides the uniform and books, is given to the pupil obtaining each certificate of either class, which is intended to cover the expenses of living while at the school; and his travelling expenses are also paid. The instruction in drill is conducted strictly on the principles laid down in the field-exercise book for the regular army, which are explained and illustrated by lectures. The pupils, after a certain time, are attached to companies of the 16th Regiment; they attend the company officers and those on regimental duty during the performance of their various duties, and so have ample opportunities of becoming practically acquainted with them. Military habits and discipline are enforced, the pupils, for the time, being under military law. Since the opening of the school on the 1st of March last, the number of pupils who have entered is 234, of whom 116 have obtained second-class certificates, while eighteen have obtained first-class certificates. Independently of the universal desire shown by the Canadian youth to become qualified for military duty, the country is much indebted for the popularity and usefulness of the school to the admirable system and discipline established by the able officer under whose command it has been placed, as well as to the zeal and ability shown in imparting instruction by the Adjutant, Captain Carter.

In Lower Canada the school is established at Quebec, in connection with the 17th Regiment, which has also been most successful, and admission to it is equally sought by the youth in that section of the province. The numbers who have entered is 186 up to August 1, of whom eighty-eight have obtained second-class certificates, while fifty-seven have obtained first-class certificates.

ENLISTMENT OF IRISH AND GERMAN EMIGRANTS ON THE BATTERY, AT NEW YORK.

Our Engraving (from a sketch by Mr. C. D. Shanly, of New York) gives a fair idea of the scene which may be witnessed any day in that city, where the most strenuous efforts are now made to draw foreigners to the recruiting-offices. Castle Garden—once a popular place of amusement, and famous because within its walls Jenny Lind first sang before an American audience—has for several years past been used as a harbour of refuge for newly-arrived emigrants from all parts of Europe. Close by it, on the piece of ground known as the Battery, a large recruiting-station has just been established. Immense placards, in English and German, calling for men to serve in the army and navy of the United States, are displayed on the walls of the buildings, and the tempting sum of 600 dollars is offered to the wavering emigrants to induce them to enlist. But this sum of 600 dols. is in paper, not in gold; so that, with the existing depreciation of the United States currency, it is worth but little more than one third of that amount. It may be owing to this that the recruiting officers on the Battery do not appear to be doing a very brisk business among the emigrants. On the occasion of our Artist's last visit to the place there were a good many Germans and Irish loitering around, but he did not remark any great display of military ardour among them. No drink stronger than lemonade is allowed to be dispensed at Castle Garden, and a tall Irishman was observed wincing under the application of that mild acid, with which a dyspeptic-looking soldier was trying to convert him into food for powder. Whisky-punch would have been more to the purpose. The German cream-breasted, buxom lasses, for the most part, in jaunty hats and feathers—look very sharp after their young men, interfering sadly between them and the insinuating sergeants. The fifes and drums on the roof of the principal recruiting-office are like reminiscences of Richardson's Booth. They have no attractions for the Germans, at least, who are accustomed to better music at home. In the foreground of the Engraving we observe a self-possessed boy, with but few clothes upon him. He is a type of the unaccountable young gentleman peculiar to all American crowds—hatless, shoeless, almost nude, but always provided with the contingent remainder of a cigar, and evidently quite aware that there is no legal barrier between him and the Presidential chair at the White House.

THE LIGHTHOUSE AT COLOMBO, CEYLON.

We have engraved, from a photograph by Messrs. Slinn and Co., of Colombo, Ceylon, a view of the old Lighthouse, Battery, and Flagstaff, which mark the approach to that town from the sea. Colombo, situated upon a ridge of sand and rocks between the mouth of the river Kalany and a lake infested by swarms of mosquitoes and frogs, is not, according to Sir Emerson Tennent, the most salubrious place in the world; and the port is a mere roadstead, none but light native craft being able to come up to the wharves and the fort. He thinks it ought not to have been chosen for the seat of the Ceylon Government. The fortress was built by the Dutch, and its outer defences consist of four bastions, with counterscarps and ravelins on the land side, and seven batteries towards the sea. The English residents of Colombo for the most part dwell in their villas overlooking the bay; or in the cinnamon gardens, which are now left to grow wild; or under the cool shade of the cocoanut groves by the shore, in the beautiful suburb of Colpetty. There are many families of Dutch and Portuguese creoles in the town; but the bulk of the population consists of native Cinghalese, Tamils (or people from Southern India), Moors, and Malays, whose huts are built of whitewashed mud, and either roofed with red tiles or thatched with the leaves of the palm.

MUSIC.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

This great music-meeting was held last week, beginning on Tuesday, the 6th, and ending on Friday, the 9th, of September. In a financial point of view it has been one of the most successful, and, artistically speaking, one of the most interesting festivals on record.

To give an idea of the magnitude and importance of the Birmingham Triennial Festival a few figures will suffice. The first meeting was held in the year 1768, and they have been continued without interruption down to the present time. Their object originally was, and has always been, the support of the Birmingham General Hospital, the largest provincial institution of its class in the kingdom, which, since its foundation, has afforded charitable relief to above half a million afflicted persons. Of this vast establishment the Musical Festival has always been the principal support. The receipts of the music-meetings have exceeded two hundred thousand pounds, and of this sum above eighty thousand have been handed over to the support of the General Hospital. The remainder of the receipts have been exhausted in payments to the vocal and instrumental performers and other expenses. So that the Birmingham Festival has been pre-eminent as an agent in the encouragement of the art of music in this country as well as in the work of benevolence and charity. During the period of its existence there have been music-meetings of a similar kind at various other provincial towns; but, with the exception of the "Meetings of the Three Choirs" and the Norwich Triennial Festival, they have been discontinued for want of support, while the Birmingham Festival has been carried on with increasing and increasing success; a result certainly owing to the energy and judgment with which it has been managed,—and only in the number of new works by great composers which it has been the means of giving to the world, but in the unparalleled excellence and grandeur of its performances.

The following principal singers were engaged on this occasion:—Mdlle. Titiens, Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, Miss Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Mario, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Weiss (bass). Mr. Weiss's name appears in the list of principal vocalists for the first time. The solo instrumentalists were Mdme. Arabella Goddard (piano) and Mr. Sainton (violin). The organist was Mr. Stimpson. The chorus consisted of nearly four hundred voices—sopranos, contraltos, altos, tenors, and 88 basses—in all, 356. The instrumental band included fifty-four violins, eighteen violas, seventeen violoncellos, eighteen double-basses, with the usual complement of wind and percussion instruments. The whole of this splendid band, chorus, and organ was under the command of Mr. Costa. When they mustered on Monday morning for the general rehearsal one important individual was absent—Signor Mario—whose state of health at the time rendered his appearance in any music set down for him throughout the festival was ably sung by Mr. Cummings, a young singer of great promise, who, on this occasion, if it may be said, without any disparagement to him, that the place of Mario could not be filled by any substitute whatever. The whole of Monday, from ten in the morning till near midnight, was occupied with little respite, in one of the most laborious rehearsals we have ever witnessed.

The festival began on Tuesday morning with a most magnificent performance of Mendelssohn's oratorio of "Elijah," the first time which has been somewhat thrown into the shade by the greater lustre of his subsequent chef-d'œuvre, "Elijah." This, indeed, is no more the case at present than "St. Paul," as a work of genius, is not inferior to "Elijah," and, though not now so popular, will probably live as long. The impression made by "Elijah" at Birmingham to this oratorio was shown by the greatness of the audience attracted by it on this occasion. Every corner of the Town-hall was crowded, and hundreds were turned away from the entrance at last. The solo singers in this performance were Mdlle. Titiens, Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Weiss, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Briggs—a young singer who joined with good effect in the concerted music. The subtlety of the whole performance throughout has never been exceeded; and though the Birmingham audience abstain from applause on such occasions, yet the profound impression made upon them was evident.

The first evening concert, on Tuesday, derived an especial interest from the production of Mr. Barnett's new cantata, "The Ancient Mariner," written expressly for this festival. It proved to be well worthy of Mr. Smart's high reputation, and its success was triumphant. It is founded on an old Irish tradition, which has been made the subject of a ballad by Mr. Crofton Croker. The Lord of Dunkerron is enamoured of a mermaid, who receives his love, but warns him of the perils attending its indulgence. He hurries a bevy of her sea-nymphs to the altar, and celebrates his nuptials to her home beneath the deep. But her haughty kindred are indignant at her union with a mortal, and a storm is raised which overwhelms the happy pair in the raging ocean. This is the Irish Scandinavian legends of the Rhine, which are familiar to the lovers of German poetry and romance, is altered in the hands of Mr. Smart, although we confess we have little sympathy with the joys and sorrows of those creatures of the fancy. But such subjects have been treated successfully to many musicians, of whom Mr. Smart is by no means one of the least successful. "The Bride of Dunkerron" has many beauties. It is rich in imagination, full of original and picturesque melody, and masterly in construction and style. The performance was excellent. Mdme. Sainton-Dolby sang the character of the bride; Mr. Weiss, that of the stern sea-king, her father, and Mr. Cummings that of her unfortunate lover. The work was applauded to the echo, and will probably gain considerable popularity. The remainder of Tuesday evening's concert included several favourite vocal pieces, sung by Titiens, Weiss, Santley, and Sainton-Dolby. Mdme. Goddard's performance in D minor was splendidly played by Arabella Goddard.

The most important novelty of the festival—Gounod's "Redemption"—was given on Wednesday morning. Its success was most complete. During the performance, there was, of course, no applause; but several of the finest airs and concerted pieces elicited a murmur as a signals given by Lord Lichfield, the noble president of the festival. At the conclusion, however, the audience, as by one impulse, broke out without restraint, and for several minutes the hall resounded with acclamations. The judgment thus uttered by the audience was fully ratified by the voice of the ablest critics, who have pronounced "Redemption" to be, not only superior to the composer's previous oratorio, "Ste. Cécile," but the greatest work of its class since "Elijah." In our own part, we do not know any oratorio of the present day that is worthy to be compared with it. Even Meyerbeer's "Africaine," produced (as our musical readers are aware) at the Norwich Festival in 1862. The text of Gounod's oratorio, from the pen of Mr. Bartholomew, is founded on the story of Naaman, the great Syrian warrior, whose miraculous recovery from a mortal disease and consequent conversion to the faith of Israel, as told in the Second Book of Kings, are known to every reader of the Bible. This, together with several episodic incidents illustrative of the divine power of the Prophet Elisha—particularly his replenishing the widow's cruise of oil and restoring to life the dead son of the Shunamite woman—form the substance of the work. It is throughout replete with the highest art of musicians, and has enabled Costa to display his powers both of description and invention. The music is full of grandeur and sublimity, as well as tenderness and pathos. It shows, moreover, a great artistic progress since the production of "Ste. Cécile," a progress which evinces a profundity of design and a mastery over the resources of counterpoint evidently resulting from deep and persevering study. We regard "Naaman" not only as a great work, but as an earnest of greater efforts yet to come. The performances of this noble oratorio were in all respects admirable. Naaman was represented by Sims Reeves, Elisha by Santley, Adah (the Jewish handmaiden, whose energy mainly contributes to the master's cure and conversion) by Adelina Patti, the widow by Mdme. Dolby, and the Shunamite woman by Mdme. Rudersdorff; and not only they, but the orchestra and chorus, showed by their zealous efforts the interest they felt in the success of the work.

The concert of Wednesday evening, though it did not present anything absolutely new, was one of the finest we have ever witnessed. Instead of a jumble of the fashionable pieces of the last London season, there was a selection of the most refined and classical music, wrought with a single piece of an inferior description. The first part consisted of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" (or Hymn of Praise), a work first produced in this country at the Birmingham Festival of 1840, and now well known to the English public by repeated performances at Exeter Hall and elsewhere. The solo parts were sung by Mdme. Sainton-Dolby, Miss Palmer, and Mr. Lewis. The miscellaneous portion of the concert included, among other interesting matter, the Invocation to Hope from "Fidelio," sung by Titiens; the air from "Don Giovanni," "Non mi dir," sung by Adelina Patti; the grand scena from "Les Noces de Figaro," sung by Mdme. Rudersdorff; Mdme. Dolby; the air "Oh, rudder than the cherry," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea," sung by Santley; and the lovely trio from the same work's overture, "The Ruler of the Spheres," sung by Mdme. Rudersdorff, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Santley. The band played Weber's overture to "The Ruler of the Spheres," and Spohr's overture to "Anacreon"; and Arabella Goddard, with M. Sainton, played Beethoven's fine sonata in G, op. 30, for the piano and violin. The hall was full to overflowing.

On Thursday morning the oratorio was "The Messiah," the whole of the band and chorus being given to Mr. Sims Reeves. In the first and second parts the soprano was assigned to Mdme. Sherrington, in the third to Mdme. Patti. The contraltos were Mdme. Lemmens and Mdme. Dolby and Miss Palmer, and the whole of the bass was allotted to Mr. Santley. The Reeves-Sherrington-Lemmens-Santley quartet in the well-known air with that profound feeling of religious awe with which it always inspires an English audience.

The concert on Thursday evening opened another novelty—Mr. Sullivan's cantata entitled "Kenilworth"—a work of considerable merit, and favourably received. The words, from the pen of Mr. Chorley, is a kind of "masque," descriptive of the pageants and entertainments given at Kenilworth to Queen Elizabeth by her favourite, Leicester, in 1575. The poetry is generally of a pleasing interest either dramatic or romantic, and without any expression of passion or feeling. Sir Sullivan's music is quaint and pretty; and this, we think, is all that can justly be said in its praise. The remainder of the evening's concert was light and pleasing.

The last morning performances, on Friday, consisted of Beethoven's beautiful and dramatic oratorio, "The Mount of Olives," Mozart's "Twelfth Mass," and Spohr's "Consecration of Tones." Several airs and choruses from Handel's "Solomon." Beethoven's divine work was magnificently performed, the principal parts being sung by Mdme. Rudersdorff, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Sudlow, and Mr. Weiss. The solo instrumentalists were Mdme. Arabella Goddard (piano) and Mr. Sainton (violin). The organist was Mr. Stimpson. The chorus consisted of ninety-four sopranos, eighty-two contralti, eighty-eight tenors, and 88 basses—in all, 356. The instrumental band included fifty-four violins, eighteen violas, seventeen violoncellos, eighteen double-basses, with the usual complement of wind and percussion instruments. The whole of this splendid band, chorus, and organ was under the command of Mr. Costa. When they mustered on Monday morning for the general rehearsal one important individual was absent—Signor Mario—whose state of health at the time rendered his appearance in any music set down for him throughout the festival was ably sung by Mr. Cummings, a young singer of great promise, who, on this occasion, if it may be said, without any disparagement to him, that the place of Mario could not be filled by any substitute whatever. NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE DONCASTER MEETING.

The Doncaster Corporation were wise in season when they paved their "Mecca and Foster Reform Bill" last May for the enlargement of their Central Stand, and set Mr. Anchay to work with all speed. The £1800 has been laid out. The "Eudoxa Reed Stand" received sixty or seventy more subscribers in consequence; if there had not been room for them, the Corporation they would have been left; and the new flight of steps a little beyond the winning-post supplied a great want most especially. In fact, with the exception of the complaints of trainers and jockeys, that their original ones has been curtailed, there was but one feeling about the alterations, which are all strictly in keeping with the grand outline of the original building. The Corporation may "be thankful," but still they can hardly "rest" while their meeting advances with such sure, steady strides. The fresh outlay of this year has produced a very large percentage, and, putting aside the new sources from which this is drawn, and comparing with the Corporation summary issued on the Saturday night with those of last year, which are the largest on record, we find that they amount to £1000 more than in 1863, a still more proud progress is to be found in the fact that this nugget is only £100 less than the receipts of the whole week at Stockwell's year, which first ushered in "the golden age" for Doncaster.

The proceedings fairly opened about three o'clock on Monday, with the arrival of a steamer from Hull with a pack of nearly four dozen horses and vans bearing the fortunes of Blair Athol, General Peel, Baragnah, and the Miner. The two first-named were the favourites of many of them, and therefore the attention of the crowd was specially concentrated on the "Peel" and "the pudge" chestnuts, as the two latter were promptly termed when stripped on the scales and saddled. There had always been a strong feeling after York that both the cracks had a slightly overtrained appearance, but as staying was concerned, and Miner was the horse on whom the holders relied very fondly to pull them through the Leger, neither Peel nor Blair had this distinguished schoolmaisters, looked and went well on the one next morning; but those who expected to see a brilliant bay round John Scott, with his favourite "Mr. Merry" on his back, for the Cleveland, were fated to disappointment. Lord Derby was not in the town at all, Lord Glasgow was engaged at Ayr, and Lord Exeter only appeared to watch the slow half-mile canter in which "The General" was indulged. The Baronet's colours were in the charge of Sutton, who rode Benefort to look on, and Ely had a smart break with his Principal. The long lack of anything like real rain had made the going very hard, and some anxiety was expressed as to the effect which it might not cause pretty quickly before morning, a horse of "The General's" great frame and power could shaken over such a Caithness pavement.

The sales on Tuesday were rather slow, and the highest yearling, Sir Atticus by Newminster, only fetched 300 gs. Captain Machell's lot, headed by the leviathan, My Partner, derived some little interest from the fact of Mr. Merry's having purchased the latter in some rather slow "fifty" biddings, she was knocked down to Mr. Jackson for 700 gs. Mr. Merry's next purchase was Mr. Crawley's "valuable mind" were present, and made one or two purchases. The yearlings, as a lot, were not very inviting, but we heard that one of the best-looking in the room, a bay colt, brother to Bothwell, sold privately, by Captain Skipworth, to Lord Uxbridge for a large sum, and rumour spoke highly of one or two more which changed hands after the sale of the pell, as Zambesi, 800 gs., did last year.

The Two-year-old Stakes should have £200 added to it in order to make it the great weight-for-age short-distance "cup" of the week, but neither Lord Clifden nor Borealis is it. Still it brought sixteen to the post, and Mr. Merry and Argonaut, the Duke and Mr. Adventurer, who has been laid up in ordinary for a long time won very cleverly, giving Mr. Merry's colt 5 lbs. and a beating. In his turn, gave Victorious, the favourite, two stone, and beat him a head, it was no small performance. The Glasgow Stakes was remarkable for "the bad fourth" which the St. Leger, the Two Thousand, and Derby go, as a yearling, played in it. His Lordship was pretty nearly in the position of Mr. Merry's colt at the Great Yorkshire Handicap, as the horse was outpaced from the first, and his Lord-Clifden effort to come through the field was not made. Magnum Bonum (very carefully ridden by Norman) was a hopeless failure. The 900-guinea Blouthus, and the 800-guinea Bedminster had no chance with the first three, Sir Stanley, Zambesi and the first favourite, Gardevisure, came right away from their eight opponents, and the Whitewall mare, Lady Audley, half sister to Queen Bertha, and with no great scale about her, was a bad third, but considerably before Bedminster. The winner looked far better than he has ever done before, and, getting 5 lbs. from Ely, he won his race from his mare opponent (who did not go so well as usual) by a neck cleverly. His Lordship's success did not end here, and it is said that Mr. Merry did not back him. John Osborne won the Fifty Sovs. Scramble for the Grand Stand "Across the Flat" course, Sir Tatton Sykes has intrusted the future paddock fortunes of Sledmere. This closed a good level day's sport, in which seventy-two horses ran, or nearly a third of the entries as long ago as last June. Prince Hunabet, the heir apparent to the throne of Italy, was present in the balcony of the Grand Stand during the whole of the day's racing, and his national flag was hoisted to keep the weather-beaten tricolor in countenance. The evening was small, crowded in a very moderate night. Blair Athol still led General Peel, while Miner was hardly so good a favourite, and the confidence in Baragnah slightly "hardened."

The sales on Wednesday, the first day of the meeting of the old Hampton Court style, the Prince of Wales, one of Mr. Newton's yearlings by Lambton from Queen Bertha, was purchased by Mr. Jackson, who went up to 1070 gs.; but, when the Earl's "end ten" had been presented, the auctioneer's services would have been dispensed with. Having once got his hand in, his Lordship bought Chipiea by Lambton, and half-brother to Zambesi, for 800 gs. These prices, aided by 420 gs. for Wild Dayrell by Newminster, the average for the Caxton yearlings to nearly 400 gs. Mr. Pedley's did not make great prices; but a colt by Stockwell from Cowslip, by Weatherbit from Gamester's dam, fetched 820 gs., and attracted a great deal of attention, which Prince of Wales did not. The stream of carriages and people to the course was indeed an falling off, despite the warnings over head, and it was still flowing steadily at half-past one o'clock, when the first race was run, and when the first chime of the saddling bell. With it Lord Glasgow's troubles began. His Sister to Achaan went to the post for the Two and Threes, but insisted on running the course the wrong way; so the rest started without her, and she had her will, and won the Maiden Plate, for which four others also ran. The ship's Young Melbourne colt, with Aldcroft on him, was a bad last of the four. It was pouring steadily when the ten numbers went up the St. Leger Handicap, and the betting seems to have been rather in the square acre. Still the tykes stood it very unflinchingly, and there was a tantalising suspension of interest at the gate of the usual passage from the rubbing-house was thrown open, and there stood Ivri Ely (Custance), Casabianca (A. Edwards), looking much thicker and better than he did at the Derby, with Aldcroft in the "all blue" on Knight of Snowdon behind them. Ely's head was as much in the air as ever, and he also looked rather more leggy, and seemed to lack the stamina for such a severe course. Miner (Osborne) was a Rataplan all over, but a common style of horse by the side of some of his more fashionable opponents; and few had eyes either for Black Rock (Fordham) or Brindle (F. Adams). The Whitewall three were headed by Baragnah (Ashmall); then General Peel followed, led by Peirce and with Wells in the saddle, and Claremont (Goater) whipped in. The great northern stable certainly did its duty by its favourite race. Blair Athol was the last out, and, although Gaper's ground had been scratched during the morning, and Challoner was at liberty, Mr. L'Anson once more intrusted his chestnut to James Snowden, who rode him so determinedly for the Derby. Challoner was therefore a looker-on, and Sam Rogers did not come at all.

The old allegiance of the million, which had rather wavered since York, came back in all its strength when the Derby winner was once more seen face to face with General Peel, and the large ends and rather light saddle of the Eclipse were anything but in favour with the staying such a distance. Scarcely were the casters over when the weather broke, and the long-awaited rain began—what at twenty-five Knight of Snowdon, Ely, and Cambuscan joined, and The General remained at the post like a sheep—sent off in great style, and Jockey Snowden was soon wet to the skin himself, and therefore there was no time for finesse at the post, and the parade in front of the stand was wholly dispensed with. The mud accumulated more in all round the course, and for all practical purposes of observation the race might have been run during a thunderstorm. People almost seemed to forget that the Leger was running as the elements descended on to them with all the emphasis of a thunderclap; but still they stood it out grimly, muddier in shoulder, and scarred shelter till all was over. Seeing anything was out of the question, as the wet had soddened all the colours to one, Mr. Merry heard a shout that The General was "leading again," and then you had to follow their flights purely by guesswork. When through a slight glimpse of them, or rather a moving shadow of them, above the people's heads, near the turn at the Red House; and when they were fairly round the last bend then was a shout that General Peel was not placed on the inside, and that the Derby winner was "going like a lion" on the out. On they came, swimming in blue, which proved to be Cambuscan, whom his owner was said to have backed for a place, and sticking well to the Whitewall horse; but it was all over—Jack of sticking well to the Whitewall horse; but it was all over—Jack of them, as the "muddy face" was called, was in front, and clear of his horses on the outside, and in a few more strides Snowden had completed his triplet of victories, and added the sixth name, Blair Athol, to the record of double firsts, on which Champion, Surplice, Voltigeur, Sleeveless, and West Australian are already inscribed. The Flying Dutchman, and West Australian are already inscribed. The Flying Dutchman, and West Australian are already inscribed. The race might be said to have been run in profound silence, as people were too much wedged together, and too uncomfortable to be shouting. The return of Blair Athol to be weighed then up, and the cry of "Yorkshire rear" for the son of Blink Bonny floated over the noor as the two Scotch-breeders were raised by the shoulders to weigh in. Wells dismounted, and then the Blair Atholites took it up again and again, as the dripping heralds rushed out of the weighing-house and exulted with a triumphant shout that Snowden had passed the clerk of the scales "all right."

Annexed is the official account, which must have been read with peculiar zest by those who went to see the race, and felt that they had practically seen nothing, but only caught a momentary shower-bath for the millions.

Perhaps the most trying thing to the feelings was to run the gauntlet of the streets once more and observe the complacent grin on the features of the non-racing population, as seated high and dry, at their latticy, watched the dripping St. Leger-goers shaking their muddy hack, and hoped they had sated their thirst for true turf knowledge. However, the tykes strode lustily along, happy in the thought that the best horse had won, and bore their lot with the grim fortitude of "The Old Guard." "It 's something," said one, "we 've shown that Tyne-side 's what a jolly good race-course is like; but then there was not much comfort to be derived from that. Be that as it may, it is a still deeper comfort that the mooted question has been settled, and that Blair Athol (on which such reams have been written) is virtually at rest; and, without reviving the question as to whether the Glasgow lot was ridden judiciously or not last May, few indeed would care to back him against the chestnut at the Derby distance now. The Corporation have also improved the accommodation for the Leger, taken at the Stand, up to the Leger night, was £5972, or nearly £200 beyond last year.

A despatch received at Paris from Constantinople states that, in consequence of the explanations of Nubar Pacha, the Porte has accepted the views of the arbitration of the Emperor of the French.

Letters from Senegal, dated July 5, give an account of an expedition at present engaged in exploring the course of the Niger, under the auspices of the French Government. The plan of the expedition was drawn up by General Faidherbe, Governor of Senegal, and its execution confided by him to Lieutenant Mage, of the Imperial Navy, and Dr. Quintin, a naval surgeon. The object of the explorers is to trace the lower course of the river from the kingdom of Timbuctoo to the Atlantic, of which nothing anything is known. There is, however, good reason to believe that it passes through regions rich in natural productions, and to offer great resources to trade and industry; General Faidherbe therefore to open communication between those countries and the European markets in that part of Africa, which is the principal object of the enterprise undertaken by Lieutenant Mage, who is well known for his previous explorations in 1853 and 1854. The last letters received from the travellers, dated May 2, state that the expedition had descended the Niger from Nyamina to Segou, and there then staying at the latter place with an influential chief named Sambo Sanfara-mokhi, who had passed a considerable time in Senegal, and there acquired from the French some knowledge of the military art. He is at present an officer of engineers in the service of El-Hadj-Omar, one of the most powerful Sovereigns of Central Africa, and has built fortresses for that Prince at Segou-Sikoro, Koundian, and Nioro. The explorers were in hopes of soon being able to continue their journey, after first going to Hamdallahi, to pay a visit to El-Hadj-Omar, who appears disposed to enter into friendly relations with France. They have forwarded to Governor Faidherbe much interesting information respecting the countries through which they have passed. The population of Segou-Sikoro is a state of continual alarm, as their chiefs seem inclined to form alliances with France. Should these alliances be realised, a political situation similar to that which existed in Upper Senegal would soon follow, and posts and establishments would be founded by which the Niger would be rendered accessible to commerce. The last letters from which the above particulars are extracted represent the explorers as having left Segou-Sikoro, and proceeding in canoes, accompanied by the Cayor; the works of the establishment at N'goungo were then being carried on with great activity, and were to be completed during the Government instituted by his late adversary, Lat Dior, who had been abandoned by all his former supporters.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

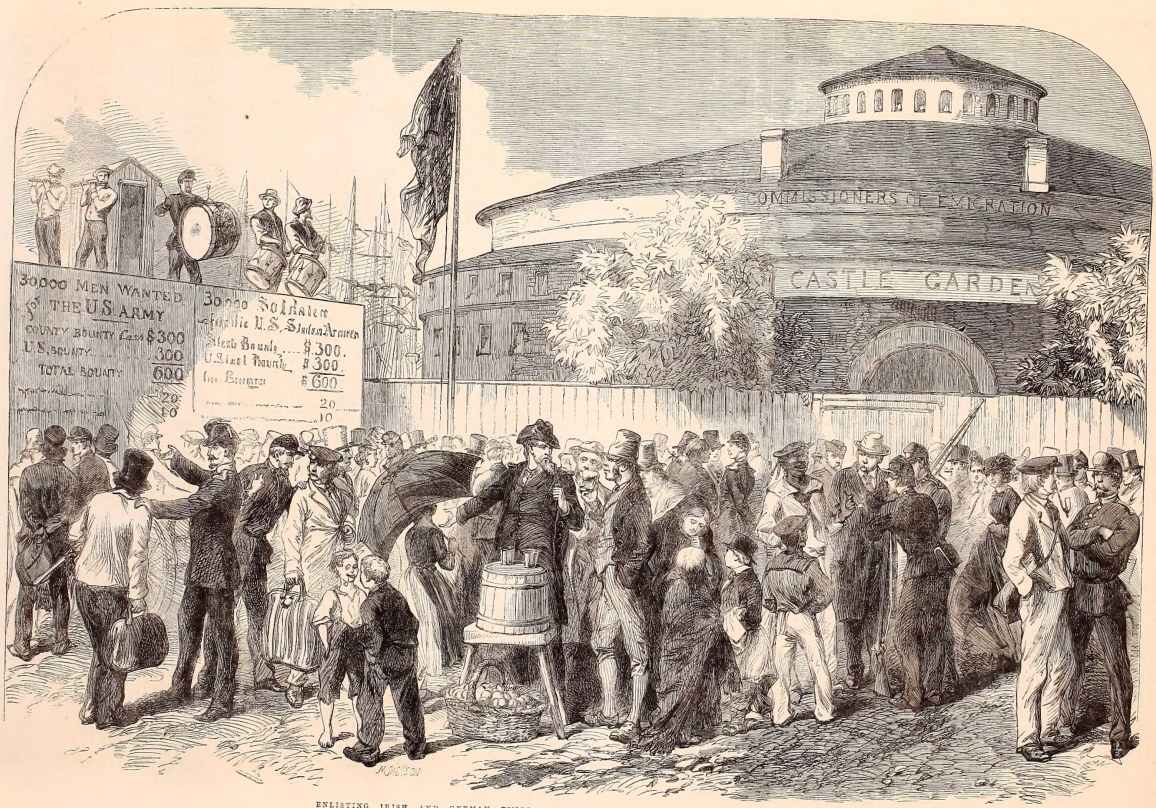
In the early part of the week there was an improved feeling in the market for most national securities, with an upward movement in the quotations; since then, however, a reaction has taken place, and the closing prices are generally lower than those of Monday. In imperial stocks the business transacted has been moderate, and the fluctuations unimportant. Indian Stocks have commanded very little attention; yet, consequently with the scarcity of money, the demand for them has been limited.

The demand for accommodation at the Bank of England has been only moderate. In the open market the disparity is steady, as the annexed note for the week will show:—

Thirty days' bills	½	per cent. Four months' bills	⅝ per cent.
Two months' bills	½	per cent. Six months' bills	⅝ per cent.
Three months' bills	½	per cent.

In the Stock Exchange loans for short periods have declined to ½ and 5 per cent. The following are the rates of interest for deposits by the joint-stock banks and discount houses:—

Joint-stock banks	½ per cent.
Discount houses at call	½
Ditto, with 7 days' notice	½
Ditto, with 14 days' notice	¾



Throughout the Continent money is advancing in price, with a good demand. The rates for the leading cities are as follows:—

Paris	per cent.	per cent.	Amsterdam	per cent.	Bank rate. Open market.
Trieste	6		Brussels	3½	3½
Vienna	6		Brussels	4	4
Berlin	6		Frankfort	4	4
Hamburgh	6		Petersburg	6	6

Over £500,000 in bullion has arrived during the week, and several parcels of gold have been sent into the Bank of England. The total amount held by the Government is now £23,000,000.

Consols were somewhat on the advance on Monday. The Three per Cents, for Money, realised to 8½; Ditto, for Account, 8½; Reduced and New Three per Cents, 8½; and Long Annuities, 8 5-16. On Tuesday the quotations were 8½ to 9-16, 8½, 8½, and 8 5-16. On Wednesday they were 8½ to 9-16, 8½, 8½, and 8 5-16. On Thursday they were 8½ to 9-16, 8½, 8½, and 8 5-16. On Friday they were 8½ to 9-16, 8½, 8½, and 8 5-16. Bank Stock realised 241 to 243, and the Bank Premium 42 to 44. Exchequer Bills, 2s. to 3s. dis. Bank Stock, 242 to 244; Reduced, 92½ to 93; New Three per Cents, 92½ to 93; Ditto, for Account, 92½ to 93; India Stock, 242 to 244; Ditto Bonds, 2s. to 3s. dis.; Exchequer Bills, 2s. to 3s. dis.

The Foreign Stock Exchange has been very dull, and prices have, in some instances, slightly declined. The leading speculative stocks have been as follows:—Buenos Ayres, 6 per Cents, 72½ to 73; Ditto, 3 per Cents, 47½ to 48; Chilian, 6 per Cents, 102½ to 103; Ditto, New, 4½ per Cents, 93½ to 94; Ditto, 3 per Cents, 71½ to 72; Danish, 5 per Cents, 103½ to 104; Ditto, 3 per Cents, 71½ to 72; Egyptian, 7 per Cents, 103½ to 104; Ditto, Unified, 4½ per Cents, 93½ to 94; Ditto, Guaranteed, 3 per Cents, 71½ to 72; Mexican, 3 per Cents, 19½ to 20; Peruvian, 4½ per Cents, 84½ to 85; Portuguese, 3 per Cents, 44½ to 45; Russian, 5 per Cents, 103½ to 104; Spanish, 3 per Cents, 39½ to 40; Turkish, 6 per Cents, 103½ to 104; Ditto, Anglo-Turk, 6 per Cents, 103½ to 104; Spanish Three COUNTY members are on their trial. A formal indictment has been drawn up against them. The issue to be decided is "whether they cannot put more solid materials than they do into after-dinner speeches to their constituents; or whether, in fact, the ability and inclination to do so is not a proper qualification for a county member." In another count of the document it is laid down "that no educated gentleman should spear before any body of persons, however mixed and ignorant, without a sense of responsibility. By standing up at all, he undertakes to say what is worth their attention, and whatever nonsense is worth the attention of no human being. The chances are that in trying, as it is called, to meet them on their own level, he will be unreal and unnatural, and loses the respect of those whom he thus patronises, like grown people conversing with children in words of one syllable. If a man cannot talk simply without sinking into the feeblest commonplaces, or find any points of sympathy with those he addresses except those previous, he is an unfit to be a county member as he is to address a jury." All this is related in a metropolitan journal apropos of the speeches of two of the members for Middlesex at a meeting at Thame. The biliary tendency of these strictures is easily accounted for. The premiss of Mr. Henley, the third member for Oxfordshire, who always contrives to say something pointed, if not original, has rendered this particular meeting notable and to be noted by the writers of articles at a season of the year when that body is in a state of drought. On the present occasion, for reasons on which every one who has any knowledge of Oxfordshire sympathize, Mr. Henley was absent, and the proceedings suffered accordingly. Some of "Thame" meeting would have been written without the letter "h" in order to symbolize the occasion. The journalistic imputation was wanting, and nothing was left but to endure the reproach of not afford amusement to the ordinary reader. Thus it is Colonel North and Colonel Fane find themselves set up as melancholy examples of failure and humiliation in the county member's point of view. Of course this is very terrible; and, no doubt, the Oxfordshire members and the Middlesex county which has elected them and has hitherto been satisfied with them are wringing their hands and calling aloud for candidates who shall fulfil the esthetic demands of the journal of fancy portraits of county members.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT.

But is their case so bad, after all? Are the Oxfordshire electors deserving of the stripes which the writer would lay more severely over their members' backs. For it must be understood that the speeches of these gentlemen were received with the ordinary conditions which exist cordially and sympathy between speakers and hearers; so that the voters are so much involved in the censure which has been passed on the meeting as the member who on that day to have been so low beneath the proper standard. The fact of the regret expressed at the absence of Mr. Henley, which was the cause of the ill-fated want of tone of the meeting, is an admission that the electors of Oxfordshire have some appreciation of the right men to represent them. But to Colonel North, whose records at the House of Commons can tell whether he is exactly the kind of member who is content to act as "having something to say," but to say that, although connected by virtue of a large estate with the landed interest, he does not profess to be a master of suggestions of economical movement, or may possess any original agricultural fallacies in as agricultural sense. He happens to have been head-literally and, for he is one of the few officers in the Army of whom we were wont though the certificate of Saulthurst—a soldier, and he applies to the practical questions connected with the service on which he has belonged; and no voice is heard more frequently during the discussion of the Army Estimates, and no one is more ready with notions of amassing military information. Of course it is to be suggested that these are strict qualifications for a county member, in a purely business; but surely it is not to be set down as a rule that all the hundred and fifty or sixty members for agricultural districts are to be chosen because of their aptitude to talk about bullocks; or as a practical man of knowledge and any like knowledge of the world is to be excluded from representing an interest in the State to which it belongs because he does not make a study of the theory of the farmers' market ordinary. Then as to Colonel Fane, he may, perhaps, belong to that old in the House of Commons who are supposed to be inglorious; but, if all one hears be true, he has some qualities which justify that confidence of his county which has made him its representative. He is one of those who does not think it inconsistent with his position, either as a landowner or as a member of Parliament, to be practical and intelligent, and to be a good companion, and to mingle with them in their hours of ease; to learn their habits, feelings, and wishes; and, perhaps, if the real truth were known, he might be caused to tell not make a philosophic-economic speech, he has so much of the real knowledge of the people around him as to render him practically helpful to members of Parliamentary majority; and it is not to the pesters of prate that the sphere of usefulness is confined. We may never open his mouth in there, yet he is a very excellent member. As to Colonel Fane's speech on the particular occasion to which allusion is being made, it was conceived in a genial spirit and, if he did not defend the "pigeons" and "sights" of his wife's agnates to the solid exhibition of the agricultural show, and expressed an opinion that they were not, as wholly out of place as a reverend gentleman had asserted, he only proved that he was in favour of that principle which is involved in the antithetical proverb "about with it and no lip. The agricultural exhibitions of a country fair are to the agricultural labourer what music-halls and theatres are to the urban population; and we believe we have never met with any but kindly advocacy of the principle of amusements for the people.

There seems to be a fatality about the Thame county gathering this year, so far as the absence of the regular stars is concerned. Here is the Sparkenhoe Farmers' Club holding its annual joust of talk at Ashby-de-la-Zouch; and in Mr. Newdegate is not found among the assembly has to fall back on Mr. Hartopp, who, as a county member, may be said lucky that we are not to have a speech from Mr. Newdegate, or he might have fared worse than the Oxfordshire members. So far as we have seen the house than either of them and therefore, of course, may be supposed to be still lower in that arbitrary scale of qualification for his function which has recently been set up by amateur authority. Mr. Hartopp, however, has had the infusion of the town element in the person of Mr. John Peel, the newspaper proprietor of Tunworth, who, after having successively educated at Manchester, and lived in the atmosphere of trade and manufactures, may be taken to have shed light and brightness on the clod-like assembly into which he was thrown. Mr. Peel came into Parliament with a certain celebrity, inasmuch as he was victorious in a contest for the Tower Hamlets, which seemed to be represented with exceeding vigour the Government in the election, and he fought in more sense than one, lead for the candidate whose cause he espoused. Mr. Peel spoke once last Session, quietly, sensibly, and to the point, and was judiciously brief. He gave no signs of an inheritance of the high Tyrwhitt Parliamentary gift, and he is a man of business, he will take a good place amongst the useful members.

There is not a better-badgered man in the house than the Right Hon. William Cowper, Chief Commissioner of Works. He has, fortunately, acquired the reputation of "having a taste," and he is supposed to exercise it with energy in the discharge of the functions of his office, given him by the ordering of many jobs in the so-called ornamentation of the metropolis. He is supposed to be answerable for all the new streets and gardening, and fountains, and architecture of public edifices; for the paintings in the houses of Parliament and for the statuary which is to be distributed about them; it may well be conceived that he has a comfortable time of it. In a degree, whatever Parliamentary troubles he has to encounter he has brought on himself; because he has not been content to rest on his vocation, a tendency to assert that whatever has been done is right; and, indeed, at times, a tenacity in reference to dress and place which, if not originally his own, he has adopted with fatherly fondness. The temptation to cynicism is consequently strong from this point of view; but, besides this, he has chosen to assume a style and a demeanour which can only be described by the word Palmerstonian, and this is another inducement to cynical members to draw him out. Although he presents a very shadowy and watery counterfeit of the great original on whom he models himself, yet he is not wholly unsuccessful in his efforts to make a good fight against his assailants, and not the less because he is always backed by the most powerful "bottle-holder" in the House, whose opinions on the matters connected with his department he is believed accurately to represent. If official aptitude is to be tested by the number of offices which a man has held, Mr. Cowper is one of the very first officials of the day, for he has been a Commissioner of Greenwich Hospital, a Lord of the Treasury, a Lord of the Admiralty, Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, Vice-President of Health, Vice-President of the Committee of the Privy Council for Education, and Vice-President of the Board of Trade, before he held his present post. The right hon. gentleman has been produced here because he has been presiding at a harvest home at Hertingfordbury, in the county of Herts, where he seems to have been especially at home.

On the 30th ult. 20,375 applications had been received, and 17,476 tested, and 14,000 passed by the Royal Society's Examiners to receive certificates of competency as masters; 627 possess certificates of competency as mates; nineteen possess certificates of competency as masters and mates; and 2000 are apprentices or men of service as mates. The Queen's colour has been erected in the new cemetery, at Stirling, to those of the 74th Regiment who fell in the discharge of their duty in India in 1857-58. The colour is a handsome granite obelisk about forty feet high, in the form of a Roman cross, trefoil headed. Within the trefoils are the names and ages of the officers who fell. Below the cross the regimental bellyband cut and gilt, records the names of nine officers, thirteen sergeants, nine corporals, two drummers, and 120 rank and file who died of disease. The sentence, "Thine, O Lord, is the honour and the glory!" The sculptor is Mr. Robert Richmond, of Stirling, and Glasgow.

The division at Aldershott, under the command of Sir J. L. Pennefather, K.C.B., consisting of the 1st Battalion Grenadier Guards, the Marquis of Ormond Warde, C.B., inspected the troops and the various departments of Woolwich garrison on Saturday last. The Duke of Cambridge arrived on the ground of the Royal Marines were, on the 8th inst., mustered on the Plumstead Marshes, and marched past the Duke, who was then put through the movements of a field-day. The troops were formed into two lines, because it is intended to form a camp for the Rifle Brigade, the whole of the force being under the command of Colonel Commandant Thomas Wynyard, C.B., of the Royal Marine Artillery, Woolwich Division.

It is likebook on the Army Medical Department an interesting account is given of the state of education among the recruits in the British Army, in the year ending March 31, 1864. The number which it appears, out of every 1000 recruits examined in English districts 229 were unable to read and write, 75 to read only, and 696 to read and write. In the Scotch districts the numbers were respectively 161, 137, and 669. In Irish districts the numbers were 439, 124, and 437. The number of men in the Army who can read and write is 1000. It appears from the above that, although there is a decrease in the proportion of uneducated in England, but scarcely any in Scotland, and a considerable increase in Ireland, the general progress in the French army in the five years 1853-9, the state of education was ascertained to be as follows:—Instruction superior to reading and writing, 1 per cent only; 32; able to read and write, 630; so that the proportion who possessed a higher than average degree of education was 663.

THE VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT.

On Saturday last the 2nd Administrative Battalion of Middlesex Rifle Volunteers met at the Bull and Gate, Kentish Town hill, near Tottenham, the seat of Lewis H. Davis, at his range at Cranbrook Park, Ilford, on the 29th ult. and three following days. The first prize, presented by Colonel Lovell, was won, and returned as having won prizes; but, as they were made by men who were disqualified, the prizes fell to the next highest scores. The second prize, a silver cup, except in the case of the challenge cup, money, and private prizes, they are the property of the winners, was won by Sergeant Cowell; the third prize, Keeller; Mr. Frederick Besley's prize, a silver cup, by Colour-Sergeant Ayrtes; Capt. Colour-Sergeant White, in first class, gained the prize of £6.

The fourth annual prize-competition of the members of the North Middlesex Rifle Corps began on Tuesday, at the ranges at Child's-hill, near Hendon. The first prize, a silver cup, was won by Private Sergt. Giles. The winners of the indies' prize and Mr. J. Mullen's prize (a silver watch) were Corporal J. Parker and Sergeant Jacks.

The annual official inspection of the 2nd Surrey Artillery Brigade was made last Saturday by Colonel Hamley, R.A., at Broom Wood, Chobham-common, by the permission of Mr. Charles Perkins. The muster was good—out of a total of 316, there being, together with those on garrison duty, but those on service, 284 men marched on. The manœuvres performed in a manner creditable alike to men and officers. Refreshments were provided on the ground by Colonel Perkins, Captain Cox, and others.

The fifth annual Enfield rifle prize-meeting, open to all Middlesex Rifle Volunteers, was held on Tuesday, 6th Middlesex, the 13th on Thursday, Wednesday, and Thursday, last week, at the ranges erected at North Down, between Margate and Broadstairs. The first prize, given by Lord Kent, was the winner of the first prize, a Steward's Lord Bury telescope, and £10 10s., with the consolation prize of a telescope and five guineas; and a centre, out of five rounds, at 500 yards. In the contest for the Isle of Thanet match, each score £20, divided into four prizes of £10, £5, £3, and £2, Private Mortlock, in shooting off, stood first, having made two centres and a bull's-eye at 500 yards, including the consolation or a gold watch, value £20, for the greatest aggregate score during the meeting, the amount was £60, divided into ten prizes. Second series, first prize, Private Sergeant, 14th Middlesex; second, Private Andrews, St. George's. Third series: First prize, Private Dickinson; second, Private Sergeant Mortlock. In addition to these prizes a gold watch, value 20 guineas, to be presented to the competitor making the highest aggregate score at the whole of the meetings, Montgomery, of the 20th Middlesex, and Private W. Dutton, of the 22nd Kent, had tied for the highest aggregate score with 69 each; and according to the rule Private Dutton won, but was subsequently beaten by it being announced that a score of 69 was made by Private Ryan, of the 4th Middlesex.

The annual prize-meeting of the 4th Administrative Battalion of Kentish Rifle Volunteers has been brought to a close at the rifle-ranges at Sittingbourne, with the following results:—First competition: Staff prizes, presented by gentlemen connected with the battalion and the officers of the battalion staff—First prize, a Dent's gold watch (presented by Colonel Dyke), value £15; second, a silver cup, value £5 5s. prize; Corporal Wilsham, also of the Yarmouth battalion, won the rifle; while the two prizes of £5 each were won by Corporal Agate, of this city, and by Mr. R. P. H. Harvey, and other prizes added by the association, were competed for by 60 efficient volunteers from each company or subdivision in Norfolk. In the prizes added by the association every £2 for the best score of £12, while the 1st Yarmouth gained the second prize. The next contest was three ranges—first, £20 and the medal of the Norfolk Rifle Association; second, £10; third, £5. Private Breese, of the 1st Norfolk, after shooting at Davidson Norfolk, gained the champion prize of £20; and Corporal Wilsham, of Yarmouth, the second prize, of £10; and Corporal Swan, of the 2nd the value of £5, given by Lieutenant-Colonel Gurdon, of the 1st Norfolk, for efficient volunteer officers of the 2nd Norfolk Administrative Battalion, open to all was won by Private Cubitt, of the Yarmouth battalion. The meeting yesterday week, with a review on the Scottish Common closed its annual Yarmouth. Colonel Lidderdale had added to the scale for that year.

About 3000 volunteers were reviewed on Saturday last by Colonel Mure, of the Manchester Brigade, at Broughton, Salford, Ashton, and Eccles, consisting of corps from Manchester, Salford, Ashton, and Eccles, Colonel Dugdale. The Manchester brigade, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel the Hon. Algernon Egerton, M.P., consisted of the 1st Lancashire Rifle Brigade, Atherton, Wigan, and Farnworth corps. Several thousands of spectators witnessed the spectacle from the high ground on the opposite side of the river Irwell, and from the windows of the houses overlooking the line of march. The movements were executed with precision, notwithstanding the unfavourable character of the weather. Colonel Mure made a congratulatory address to the volunteers, after which the gallant officer addressed a few parting words to the men—words which, coming from such a quarter, were listened to with deep attention, and were made a speech in which he modestly referred to the services rendered by the volunteers during the late visit of the Emperor Napoleon. He said, in addition, he had endeavoured to carry out the wishes of Government—above all, to add to the efficiency of the force at their disposal, which he should be glad to think at the termination of the present movement, was in the course of being increased by the remainder of his days."

The Grimsby corps has just held its annual rifle competition for the following results:—£10, presented by Mr. Chapman, M.P., for competition by Private Croft; £5, presented by Lieutenant-Colonel Heneage, for competition by Corporal Firth; a long range prize, presented by Lieutenant-Colonel Heneage, for competition by Sergeant W. Brewin, a tie between Private Wenlesdale range. The Private Stynes and Sergeant Cooper, after standing for some time, decided to toss off, and to that settlement. Lord and Lady Bulteel, with a party, which, after shooting presented by the officers of the corps, and shot for by honorary members, by Mr. Owen Roe, &c.

During last week the 1st North York Volunteers were engaged in the formation of a new rifle corps, to be called Upper Wold, which is nearly ready for use. The East York Rifle Volunteers have also formed a new

CURRENT LITERATURE.

Our Inheritance in the Great Pyramid. By Professor C. Piazzi Smyth. (1 vol. Alexander Strahan and Co.) The title of this singular book suggests at first sight some connection with those advertisements in the daily papers which promise certain fortunate persons "something to their advantage;" and one is inclined to think that he would not like to have the Great Pyramid for a very small consideration—for something less, indeed, than Essex received for the transfer of his birthright. But not many pages need be read before it is discovered that Professor Smyth's work has no object of such a mean and selfish order, but is actuated by benevolence; for a good faith so unimpeachable that it must be approached with respect and even with diffidence. It is, in fact, a Christian work in every important subject mentioned, and it owes its title to the fact that "the truly noteworthy qualities of the British inch," which has lately been assailed by the Decimal Association, "are the whole country on general science to be "really the unit of British literal measure, to be, "moreover, 'providential' in origination," and to possess "some most admirable and even transcendent scientific recommendations," were "first brought to light" by a mistake not by Mr. Taylor, from the researches in connection with the Great Pyramid; and with this most signal addition—viz., that that particular inheritance of our metric unit not come to pass by accident or chance, but was, on the contrary, the result of settled intention and high purpose, arranged from the beginning of the world!" Now, whether the God of Abraham put it into the hearts of pre-Abrahamic men of the chosen race to build up the Great Pyramid, and revealed to them the proportions in which it should be built so that there should exist even to this day the means of arriving at a perfect metrology, "of which the hereditary British measures still preserve some very recognisable traces," we do not feel competent even had we illimitable space and time, to discuss; but we do assure the reader that he will find the matter very fully handled, with forcible arguments and wonderful coincidences, in the remarkable volume to which we hereby draw attention. A perfect chronological apparatus is a desideratum, and we should be perfectly willing to have one constructed according to the principles of the Great Pyramid, but it seems to us harsh language to talk of the "Athenian schemes," of the French, because they have not yet heard of, or been convinced by, the metrological theories of the late Mr. Edgar Taylor.

The History of Windsor Great Park and Windsor Forest. By William Menzies. (1 vol. Longman and Co.) This is a book highly worthy of the regal ideas inseparable from the subject to which it is devoted. Its proportions are majestic; and all has been done that can be done with paper, print, and illustration, to render the volume princely. Its magnificence, however, is not of a gorgeous character, but a remarkable fair distribution of light and shade is the characteristic of true grandeur. The illustrations are a series of photographs, by the Earl of Caithness and Mr. Bambridge, giving a faithful representation of the most notable scenes in the park and in the forest. Of these trees some are a thousand years old, and must have afforded the shelter of spreading foliage to many a Saxon Thane. As far as he has made the woods re-echo with the name of Saxon Amaryllis more than a century before our shores resounded with the name of the Norman Conqueror. The idea of undertaking the work which he has brought to a happy conclusion occurred to Mr. Menzies during the surveys, in 1858, for the valuation of the Park and Forest, and his capacity and in his capacity of resident deputy surveyor he had, of course, peculiar advantages for the task he has so nobly and so make due use. It has been objected that his work is not so much a history as a collection of notes whereon to found a history; and that as the title is therefore a misnomer, there may be some ground for this objection, and there can be no doubt but that had it necessarily good to be put together, as a history, from the author's rich and varied collection of anecdotes, he would have made his book even more entertaining than it is; but it must have been at the sacrifice of much important feature—to wit, the grand scale upon which the volume has been wrought. There is such a thing as symmetry, with due regard to which the folio we are speaking of could hardly have been increased in bulk; and it seems ludicrous to suppose that anyone who has seen the stately volume would wish it other than it is, or would have done well to issue a trivia volume. They would have been a very Gog and Magog of books. Why, as things are, those only whose good fortune it is to be able "to go to Cumnor" can hope to possess the book; and two volumes, each at the price of this one, would very likely have diminished even the Londonian's vast acquaion. Mr. Menzies has acted wisely. He has not heaped up words to the cramping of his historical material, as he has been charged by most readers to have given them enough, which is said to be as good as a feast; and he has provided "the few" with a tortly ornament for their drawing-room tables.

The Works of William Shakespeare: the text revised by the Rev. Alexander Dyce. (9 vols. Vol. I. Chapman and Hall.) It is a great pleasure to be able to announce yet another, making the fourth, volume of Mr. Dyce's excellent Shakespeare, which is now fairly setting on an old string to celebrate the editor's praises, to admire his acuteness, and to eulogise his diligence. It will be sufficient simply to announce that the present volume contains "King John," "Richard II.," "Henry IV." and "Henry V."

Glimpses of Life and Character and Bohemian. By Peter Paterson, a Strolling Comedian. (1 vol. Edinburgh, W. P. Nimmo.) The writer of this amusing volume gives, under the (assumed, we imagine) name of Peter Paterson, an account of his experience in various capacities upon the stage and in the circus. He has not much to say which has not been said over and over again before; information from all quarters, including the well-known ballet-girl's letter from Australia; and his personal description of what he has drawn very vivid and interesting pictures of the life he has undertaken to portray. The reader will sign often, perhaps, than he will laugh over Mr. Paterson's pages, and will be inclined to echo the advice with which the volume concludes—Don't go upon the stage! Mr. Paterson himself had the misfortune to be born a gentleman, and early age, left "an excellent situation" to follow his bent, met with misfortunes and failures innumerable, learned to long for "the fleshpots of Egypt" which had been plentiful in the days of bondage (hence he had been so anxious to escape, has "been starved out of the profession," and has yet to trust, obtained employment congenial to his mature tastes, more suited to his talents, and more profitable to his treasury.

The Nun. Translated from the French of L'Abbé * * *. (3 vols. Bentley.) It is but a short time since we were called upon to notice a novel entitled in French "Le Maudit," and in English "Under his Ban." "The Nun," or "La Religieuse," is a sort of sequel to that story. The object of both books is the same, to illustrate practically the tenets of Ultramontanism. It is probable that the success of "La Religieuse" will rival that of "Le Maudit," and that the success of the former will be due to the same cause which principally led to the latter, led to the immense circulation of the latter—namely, the idea that it was written by an unbeliever in order to expose the enormities of "La Religieuse," flatly denies that "any interdicted priest has written in 'Le Maudit,'" and would have been expressed with greater force had he not the production of a layman. The cowl does not make the monk, nor does the assumption of a certain title make an ecclesiastic. Nevertheless, the novels bear internal evidence of having been written by one well acquainted with priests and priestcraft. In "The Nun" the reader is introduced "behind the gratings of religious houses," and has the veil raised "from the familiar life of the communities" but it is not always agreeable to indulgence to have the veil raised, with the exception of one rather (to English ideas) highly-coloured scene, where the struggles of natural instinct against vows of celibacy are powerfully described, there is nothing to startle the most sensitive or the prurient. The style is often rhetorical and exaggerated, but as often pigment and epigrammatic; and the dialogue is, after the manner of French dialogue generally, brisk and animated.

A Gravedigger Angel. By the Author of "A Tray to catch a Sunbeam." (2 vols. Hurst and Blackett.) A story to be read with great content; for it is healthy in tone, lively in style, and happy in result. The character most hardly dealt with is the "guardian angel;" but anybody who will be an angel must expect to be treated differently from other mortals, and bear griefs with the melancholy smile of Patience on the monument. The "guardian angel" is, of course, of the feminine gender, and she undertakes her guardianship, of course, under the influence of all-powerful love. She scorns the common-place means, "I will be a guardian angel to you or to no one, if I have to die to become one," she says, and she cannot have the gentleman whom she loves she will not have the miller who loves her. Nevertheless, she does not imitate sweet, weak Elaine, who died for lack of Launcelot's love; she enters upon the enjoyment of the property which is left her with cheerful resignation; she takes her meals regularly, and consoles herself by petting the son of him whom she would fain have called husband. The plot is exceedingly simple and is derived from no old sensational romances. but the personages are described with charming freshness, truth, and humour, and the author's unrequited love is told in an original pathos. It is a pity that there should be occasional traces of carelessness, that step-mother should be spelt with an accordance, a hyphen should be omitted (pp. 95, 98, vol. i), that a single person should be called "a party" (p. 205, vol. ii), that Sir James Huntley, who is represented to be a perfect gentleman, should say "I'll be hanged if I do" (p. 215, vol. i) and that the relative pronoun should first itself so awkwardly attended as it is in the sentence "I, whom she [meaning herself] could treat a favourite with her mistress." These are little blemishes easily removed, and one is on that account the more irritated at their appearance.

Memoires de Mdme. Roland. (2 vols. Hachett et Cie.) The victims of the French Revolution, amongst whom Madame Roland was not the least remarkable, will never fall in interest; and therefore we give a hearty welcome to a new edition of the memoirs written by Mdme. Roland during her imprisonment. M. Faugère is the editor, and he has had opportunities for rectifying and completing the work of the late M. Barrière; so that we may regard the publication as itself solves upon possessing as perfect an edition as is possible of those memoirs which, besides the personal interest attached to them, are also an important portion of general history.

The English and Australian Cookery Book. By an Australian Aristocrat. (1 vol. Simpkin, Marshall, Son, and Marston.) The merits of this book as an addition to culinary literature let cooks and housekeepers judge for themselves; it was composed, we feel sure, sufficient for us to observe that is has apparently been compiled with great diligence, and that the recommendations of its contents are remarkable for high colouring than for resemblance to nature. The dishes and the drinks treated of are many of them wonderful for their variety of nature and of flavour, and we hope, for the sake of those with edibles called Almondigos soup, ecobeche, Haman's fritters, and Huevos Haman, with the terms of Hoover, Jerked beef, Jumbles, Jumbles called jingle, shay-in-the-mouth, tewahkidde, and blow-my-skull? Yet of such the Aristologist discourses. Dangaroo is confined in this country entirely to the Zoological Society's Gardens, but those who are inclined and in a position to import the delicacy may find directions for cooking it. The last part of the miscellaneous matter (bearing upon cookery and its adjuncts) to be found in the volume is a collection of trade cards and prices, such as newspaper advertisements, have been laid under contribution to supply it.

OPENING OF BRISH GRAVES AT CASTLE HOWARD, YORKSHIRE.

LAST week an exploration of extraordinary interest was commenced upon the Castle Howard estate in the North Riding of Yorkshire. On one of the wolds or moors, the sites of some personages of the Brigantes, who were the most powerful people in the north of England when the Romans first came, and who held out against the Romans, Nature, near which lies Castle Howard, is supposed to have been one of the most important centres of the tribe, and it is the only locality in its ancient roads pointing to it denote its importance as a Roman military station. The first step in the exploration of the district was the successful opening of the Bowl Barrows, on Wesponness, near Scarborough, in 1841, there was, probably, been much regarded as of little account in the wolds, but which has not been entered upon at Castle Howard, under the superintendence of the Rev. John Kemble, M.A., the well-known author of the "Horæ Ferales," researches throughout the ancient Northumbrian kingdom, and in whose hands the examination of the Barrows on the North Riding estate is entrusted, being associated with Mr. Pycock, and other Mattton gentlemen interested in archæological pursuits. The Barrows are numerous, and are generally associated to the Pinnæ, whence we have condensed the leading details.

The operations commenced on Wednesday, the 7th inst., operator at the base of the Slingsby banks, fully 60 ft. in diameter, and, at the time of opening, about 8 ft. high. The first step was to ascertain whether it was natural or artificial, inquiry it was found that about half a century ago the field was in tillage, it is a remarkable fact, very many Barrows, and large ones, are undisturbed, are merely loose sand, and showing that the materials of the burial-mound have been brought from a distance. The first step, therefore, to obtain considerable excavation was necessary to reach the centre, the supposed seat of the original burial. In the work proceeded, and, at a depth of 4 ft. ashes and large lumps of charcoal, yet perfect in shape and preservation, were found, and the workmen showing a considerable formation, as if regularly scattered over the mound as formed. Nearly at the centre of the mound were found the ashes of an wrought flints, showing traces of fire. Because of these flints are assignable to any distinct use, but the sharpness of the edges and other appearances of the smooth of fracture expanded upon them by the Brigantian workmen. Portions of a large slab of sandstone, with the bones and teeth of animals, and a large bone, were discovered, and marked, were likewise found near the centre of the barrow. Partly charred bones were also found in the mound, and, slightly to east, fragments of three enemys urns were found only a little below the surface; two of large size, with a rudely-executed zigzag marking; and the third was of a smaller size, remains in colour, but coarser, and without the glaze. These urns had, without doubt, been originally placed and broken, as the fragments of bones and detached portions of bone had been not infrequent, there was no sufficient trace of the original arrangement proper of the three urns, the secret of the tension, however, began to show signs of a previous central excavation, though evidence as to portion of the mound had been made, and the graves had ever taken place during the present century. A casual spadeful of earth turned up by the workmen revealed the fact that the original burial had been human teeth and bones were found within a yard of the surface, and at the depth of 3 ft. 6 in. a cist of burial in a similar manner. It was then found that the cist was formed of four stones, two at the sides, one at the centre—and that the urns at the surface, being also broken, and contained similar remains to those found in the original burial-mound. Still, it was hoped that the original burial had not been disturbed. Somewhat, though trifling, in extent, the original burial had been made in the centre of the deeper the search was continued the more apparent it became that the mound had been formed in the Roman age. The type pieces of pottery, bone, ashes, with a flint or two, were found, all mixed up promiscuously. Among the bones of animals found in the cist, and about half of the original cremary urn was found, undisturbed in position, embedded in ashes, bones, and charcoal. The bones, however, were not calcined, who, finding it contained none, left half the urn undisturbed. It was of the British type, and was found to contain a small bronze instrument, where the clay was plastic. As portions of charcoal kept turning up, although the natural line of the original burial was undisturbed, the workmen continued downward, and soon revealed a somewhat oval hollow, or dish, in the earth, in which, apparently, the original burial had been placed, and on the plane, as usual. Among the ashes, at the very bottom, a beautifully-wrought flint-dagger, 6 in. long, was found. The type piece of the barrow, and the valuable find of the day.

The centre of the tumulus being now passed, Mr. Greenwell considered further excavation unnecessary in that direction. A lesser brookwork was taken further to the west, and a single flint was found. Nothing else was found. Next day, on the south-east, a sixth burial was found, the urn crushed, but the bones lying perfectly natural and the ashes in position, and incised a peck measure's capacity of burnt bones. The burial was slightly below the surface, and, as usual, surrounded by charcoal and calcined stone. Singularly enough, and as a departure from the rule, several pieces of vertebral disks, apparently of sheep, were found in the urn. Among the type pieces, being put together, made a flint implement resembling a knife, and a bronze pin, the latter very curiously the interior portion remaining for the cremation of the bodies. Next day's search, east and west, proved fruitless. The tumulus was then attacked on the south-west, and, within two feet of the field, no natural ordinance having been taken advantage of for the site. The barrow, however, was found to be a very large tumulus, about 12 ft. diameter, and short of 2 ft. high, having been reduced by the plough, but no perceptible trace of the original burial. Here, too, the urn was found with charcoal and burnt bones, and next, after noon, it we found that the whole of the south-west side of the barrow was first excavated, 5 ft. each side, from north to south, through the centre. Traces of fire increased towards the centre, until were reached twelve distinct beds of ashes of charcoal layers, with others of burnt earth and stones, but few bones. About the centre burnt stones and a few bones were found as a distinct deposit, some 3 ft. deep; and a concrete floor, laid as a fag-stones, a little above the centre, the construction was very remarkable and altogether unusual. In the centre of this large concrete floor was found a platform, a magnificent amongst or particular urn was found, but there were no bones along with it. From beneath the urn, taken, having a dentals edge, you have a sharp, a well-fitted implement was found. Hardly a vestige of the body could be seen, but it was, while it resembled, passed right through the barrow and just over the urn, may have disturbed the bones. The burial-floor—of clay, with a layer of charcoal—had been fused or baked together of extreme hardness; and in its centre was placed the urn, covered with charcoal ashes. The urn was not of the best form of the enemy vessel, but had three cordons, the ornamented under four horizontal rows of sharply-angular indentations. The whole of the fragments were of beautiful there. Inside the urn was found a bronzed-tool, and, altogether, this urn is a fine specimen of a British burial-vessel, though crushed by the falling earth from the whole-barrow. During this day the last interment discovered in this large "bone," it is thought to have been the grave of some important personage of the ancient British tribe of the Brigantes. Many antiquaries are of opinion that a vicinal way passed from Malton to Isurium (Aldborough), or Eboracum (Roman-remains) York, corresponding to this valley of the graves. The full examination of other tumuli remains over till the spring of next year.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND.

His Grace William John Frederick, third Duke and Marquis of Cleveland, Earl of Darlington, Viscount and Baron Barnard, Lord of Barby Castle, and Baron Raby, of Raby Castle, in the bishopric of Durham, died on the 6th inst., at Raby Castle, some eight months after his succession to the family honours, his brother and predecessor, Henry, second Duke, having died on the 16th of last January. history of the Church. The Prince himself was successively Extraordinary Commissionary at Toulouse, Minister at Ravaria, Envoy sent to pacify Dauphiny and Provence, Ambassador in London; and, finally, Charles the Tenth's ill-fated Minister. When made a Peer of France, in 1815, Polignac refused to take the oath because it was contrary to religion. Louis XVIII. referred the matter to the Pope, who decided against his too punctilious devotion, and in 1816 the new Peer submitted to the form. In 1820 he became a Roman Prince, three years before he was sent to London. After the Revolution of 1830, Prince Polignac was condemned to "perpetual imprisonment and civil death," but was released by the amnesty of 1836. He died March 29, 1847, leaving by his first wife (a daughter of the house of Rohan) two children—viz., 1, Alphonse, a Captain in the Artillery, who married, in 1840, Adelle Josephine Marie; 2, Louis, Comte de Polignac, who, in 1842, married, formerly an officer in the French Army; and 4, Edmond. The present head of the house of Polignac (Armand, Prince Pierre Joseph Prince of the Holy Empire) is the stepson of the Princess just deceased, being the son of the late Prince de Polignac by his wife, Barbara Campbell.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will of Lieutenant-General Sir William Brereton, K.C.B., K.H., was proved in London on the 16th ult., by his nephew William Robert Brereton, Esq., of New Abbey, Kildare, the sole executor, under the two last named, Lieutenant-General Robert Brereton. The personalty was sworn under £20,000, and the probate taken out by R. Esq., of Dublin, and another. The will bears date the 10th of April, 1858. The testator added to his signature Lieutenant-Colonel of the Royal Artillery, and he was attended by 1st Battalion, Captain Royal Artillery, and E. I. Warde, Captain Royal Horse Artillery. This gallant officer distinguished himself at the Battle of Waterloo, and died on the 27th July last, at his residence in the Albany, Piccadilly. Sir William has left legacies to his nephews and other relatives. Amongst the legatees are the names of Admiral Deans Dundas and Lieutenant-Colonel Macdonald. His brother, Sir Robert Brereton, is appointed residuary legatee. This meritorious officer has much kindly and liberally remembered his regiment, the Royal Regiment of Artillery, the Royal Artillery, and to his successors, the sum of £1000, the interest arising therefrom to be applied towards assisting in providing annually for the summer months by the non-commissioned officers of the Royal Artillery, Horse and Foot, at Woolwich, and to furnish them in obtaining the implements for the game, and also for refreshments.

The will of Charles Jacomb, Esq., of Upper Clapton, and of Basinghall-street (we proved in January), gives pecuniary legacies to the executors nominated being Charles Jacomb, Esq. (the son), Arnold Jacomb, Esq. (the nephew), and Colonel H. Jacomb, R.E. The testator carried on an extensive business with his son as woodturkers. His will bears date 1859, and is dated the 10th of May last. To his wife he has left legacies. To his daughter a provision on marriage, appointing his son residuary legatee of real and personal estate. He bequeaths to each of his sons £1000 in addition to his several grandchildren, and there are legacies to other relatives, and also to each of his clerks, and a sum of £200 to be distributed amongst his workmen. To the poor of St. Thomas, Upper Clapton, he bequeaths a legacy of £20, and he has expressed a wish that his son should purchase a piece of the adjoining premises of a new church in the said district of St. Thomas. The legacies are to be paid free of legacy duty. He concludes his will as follows:—"And I do hereby declare that every man who is possessed of property should do something for the benefit of his country, I give and bequeath to the Right Hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being the sum of £100, to be applied by him towards the reduction of the national debt."

The will of George Almond, Esq., of St. James's-street, Piccadilly, was proved in the Prerogative Court on the 13th inst. William Harry Surman, Esq., the sole executor; the personalty being sworn under £20,000. The testator was in partnership with his brother-in-law, the firm of "George and William Almond, army accoutrement-makers." The will was executed in 1854. After making a few bequests, and leaving an annuity to his widowed sister, he bequeaths to his wife a life interest in the rest of the property, with power of disposition over one third; and, upon her decease, one other third is left to the testator's brother William, and the remaining third to his executor, W. The Archbishop of Cologne, Cardinal Johannes von Geissel, has recently died, in the sixty-ninth year of his age, after having been Archbishop of Cologne for twenty-three years.

The Emigration Commissioners have chartered the Hornet, 1155 tons, Seymour, to Mr. George Thompson, for conveyance of emigrants to Sydney, New South Wales, at £12 11s. 9d. per statute adult. The Hornet is to sail from Plymouth about Oct. 15.

The reports of the Frankfort autumn fair this year state that it has passed off favourably, the transactions in woollen, worsted, linen, and cotton manufactures having been large. It is remarkable as one of the growing prosperity of the people that the sale of common goods is continually falling off, while that of the more expensive manufactures is on the horse fair is also said to have been successful. About a thousand horses were sold at prices rather higher than those realised at the previous fair in May.

Mr. John A. Time writes to the Times announcing the unsuccessful termination of the Dutch ladies' expedition on the Niam-Niams. "One of the ladies forming the expedition," he says, "in a letter recently received, informs me that, owing to the shameful manner in which they have been treated by the merchants, the expedition has been compelled to return to Khartoum without accomplishing the intended object—that of exploring the country of the Niam-Niams. She complains particularly of the conduct of Riaditi and Mahmoud, two native merchants and proprietors of caravans, or stations, on the White Nile, and who appear to wield absolute and unquestioned despotism over the natives thereabouts, and now, also, of the consular Agent Pacha, Governor of the Soudan."

A meeting to the brothers Van Eyk, the well-known painters, was inaugurated a few days ago at Maseyck, in Belgium, in the presence of the Leopold and the Count de Flandre. The statue by M. de Wiener, and the group, which is in white marble, represents the brothers at the period of the discovery of painting in oil. Jean Van Eyk is represented as having had his first picture by the new method, and has submitted it for approval to his brother Hubert, who stands near. While awaiting the opinion of his elder brother, Jean's face expresses his deep anxiety, while Hubert's countenance beams with satisfaction, and displays the confidence of a pupil's fame. The King has made the sculptor an officer in the Order of Leopold.

The Eldorado, which has arrived from Alexandria, has brought a large collection of wild animals, presented by the Viceroy of Egypt to the Kings of Siam, as well as two enormous chests full of valuable seeds and vegetables. Among the beasts are several which are said to be the first specimens of their kind that have reached Europe. These are a Thibet bear, a very beautiful bovine; a Mongolian pheasant of extraordinary size and wonderfully beautiful plumage; also a miniature doe, from Pegu, a magnificent Malacca tiger, a leopard of Senaar, remarkable for its size and ferocity; a Bornan peacock of singular beauty; two hooded pigeons, of which the fancier who may be able to acclimatise them in Europe; and a black waterfowl, the like of which is said to produce the finest effect as a violent attack of apoplexy. To the above are to be added two Siamese buffaloes, which in that strange country are trained to run races, as horses are in England and France. A Cochin-Chinese state carriage completes the list of those very original presents.

THE OSMAN GHAZY, TURKISH STEAM-RAM.

OUR Engraving on page 293 represents the steam-ram, Osman Ghazy, as she appeared on the stocks, just before she was launched, in the ship-building yard of Messrs. R. Napier and Sons, at Govan. This vessel is one of three in course of construction by the Turkish Government, the others being the Abdul Aziz, which is expected to be launched in January next, and the Orkhan, which will be ready about four months afterwards. The keel of the Osman Ghazy was laid in March, 1863. The ram is armour-plated from stem to stern, and of the following dimensions:—Length over all, 300 ft.; extreme breadth, 56 ft.; depth moulded, 37 ft.; tonnage, o.m., 4260; draught of water, 24 ft. 9 in. The stem of the vessel projects about 4 ft. beyond the upper deck at the water line, and its strength is considerably increased by a centre-line bulkhead extending backwards about 40 ft., and which is supported by a double angle iron, so as to strengthen it to resist the shock of collision with an opponent. For further security, this longitudinal bulkhead is intercepted by transverse bulkheads, thoroughly watertight, and forming a series of distinct compartments, the same as in other properly-constructed iron vessels, only they are stronger, and there are more of them. The keel is formed in three separate pieces—namely, a web plate 4 ft. deep, with two keel bars 12 in. by 3 in., riveted on their lower edge, and to which the keel plates are attached. The framework of the vessel is in six pieces, intercepted by longitudinal girders, these girders being attached to the shell plating, and secured on their upper edges by longitudinal covering plates and bars inside. The utmost care has been taken in building the Osman Ghazy to give all possible stability and strength, especially in those parts where, either in action or in stormy weather, the greatest strain may be expected to take place. The vessel in construction is similar to that of the Hector, which was built by the same eminent firm for the British Navy. The armour-plates extend 6 ft. below the water line at the middle of the ram, and are carried forward and aft, so as to extend 4½ ft. below the water line at the bow and stern. The three lower streaks are about 8¼ ft. in depth above the armour shell, and are 9½ in. thick, tapering forward to 5 in., and aft under the counter to 3 in. From this to the upper deck they are 5 in. thick, tapering forward and aft to 4½ in. The plates are pierced by portholes 2 ft. above the main deck. The portholes are 3 ft. 6 in. in height, and 2 ft. in breadth, so as to allow the guns of the main deck being worked easily. There are two magazines, and every precaution has been taken to place them, as much as possible, beyond the reach of the enemy's shot and shell. The vessel has four decks, including the upper or spar one. Great care has been taken in looking to comfort of the officers and crew in the allocation and fitting up of their quarters; and, indeed, every recent improvement in ships of war has been taken advantage of by the Messrs. Napier to make this one of the finest ever built. She will be propelled by horizontal direct-acting engines of 800-horse power, nominal, which will be supplied with steam from six boilers. Her armament, as at present arranged, will consist of twenty-four guns, though provision has been made for thirty-eight. Twenty of these will be 68-pounders, and the remaining four, which are to be placed on the upper deck, will be 110-pounders. The bow-guns are to be protected by a strong shield thrown forward on the upper deck, formed of four-inch armour-plates. The vessel is to be barque-rigged, and the lower masts and the lower and top sail yards are to be made of iron. The crew will consist of 600 men. The launch took place a fortnight ago. It was found necessary to deepen the bed of the river, by means of a dredge, immediately in front of Messrs. Napier's yard, in order to prevent the huge vessel from taking the ground in her first plunge; and a series of chain cables, attached to anchors on each side of the river, was brought into requisition to keep her length parallel with the stream. A numerous and distinguished company were present, including the Turkish Ambassador, Musurus Bey; Admiral Edhem Pacha (and Admiral Mouhyr Pacha (Sir Adolphus Slade), of the Turkish Navy; the Lord Provost of Glasgow, Mr. R. Dalglish, M.P.; and the Rev. Dr. Livingstone. The ceremony of naming the vessel was performed by Miss Dalglish. The Turkish Ambassador, by cutting a rope to which were suspended a pair of heavy weights, allowed the weights to fall so as to knock away the "dog-shores," or timber wedges, by which the ship was detained. The "Osman Ghazy" thus descended into the water, and was by the guiding-chains brought into a convenient position, whence she was afterwards towed up to Glasgow to receive her engines and the remainder of her iron plating. Our Engraving is from a photograph by Mr. T. Annan, of 202, Hope-street, Glasgow.

NEW PROTESTANT CHURCH AT LEGHORN.

WE give an Engraving of the new church just built in the town of Leghorn by what is called the "Dutch and German Protestant Congregation." It was on the 18th of February, 1836, that this congregation first obtained from the Grand Duke of Tuscany, Cosimo III., the privilege of being allowed to lay out a separate cemetery for the burial of their dead, and to assemble for the celebration of Divine service in a room on the second story of a house in Via dietro il Consiglio. The greater freedom now accorded to Protestants by the Constitution of the United Kingdom of Italy, promulgated in 1859, has encouraged them to provide a more decent building for the performance of their religious services; and, by means of subscriptions amongst the members, as well as by donations received from Holland, Germany, and Switzerland, they have been enabled, at a cost of about £5000, to erect the church which was consecrated by their clergyman, Dr. L. Detroit, on Sunday, the 7th ult., in the presence of most of the English, Scotch, and other Protestant residents of Leghorn, besides a vast concourse of people. An appropriate sermon was preached in the French language, and a "Te Deum" sung by the congregation. Divine service will be continued, as heretofore, every Sunday, alternately in the French and German language; the congregation consisting, at present, mostly of German and Swiss families, a few of the latter belonging to the French cantons of Switzerland. The expenses are defrayed by annual subscriptions raised from about fifty members, heads of families, resided in Leghorn; and the administration of its funds is confided to a consistory composed of five members presided over by a governor elected every year at a general meeting.

The architect of the building is Mr. Dario Giacomelli, to whom great credit is due for its design and execution, which have given general satisfaction, as well as for the economy with which the whole has been carried out.

THE STOCKTON AND DONCASTER RACE CUPS.

Two of our Engravings this week represent the Stockton and Doncaster race cups.

The Stockton cup, won by Bandarilla on Thursday, Sept. 1, was manufactured by Messrs. R. and E. Emanuel, of Portsmouth; designed and modelled by Mr. H. O. Hale. The group of sculpture with which it is adorned takes its subject from a passage in the fifth book of Homer's "Iliad," describing the Grecian chiefs Nestor and Diomed riding in the same war-chariot.

The Doncaster cup, shown in our second Engraving, is from the establishment of Messrs. R. and S. Garrard and Co., of the Haymarket. The design consists of a group of figures representing a hawking party in the time of the Cavaliers. The principal figure is a lady, who is on horseback; in the foreground is an attendant who has the charge of two dogs, and by the side of the lady is another attendant holding the hawk.

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION AT BATH.

THE annual congresses—for so they may be most fitly designated—of the British Association for the Advancement of Science have long outlived their probationary period. We can well remember the time when they served as a most attractive bait to the critics, and when it was esteemed capital fun to let loose the ferrets of the press upon an assembly of savans. Those days have long since passed, and so altered has become the spirit of the age that the most merciless reviler of the then high priests of philosophy is now the Corypheus of their eulogists. The society has survived the ailments of childhood, and, as might have been anticipated from this fact, it develops robuster and manlier proportions and energies year by year. The meeting of its members at Bath has been one of the most successful on record, and, albeit exhibiting no extraordinary features, imperatively claims a brief notice at our hands.

Bath undoubtedly offered an attractive locale for an assembly of the devotees of science. In the physical features of the neighbourhood it presents more than one problem well worthy of, but still waiting for, solution. It seems to challenge scientific investigation. We will not say it defies, for defiance implies antagonism, but, assuredly, it as yet eludes, satisfactory exposition. There was exquisite propriety in electing Sir Charles Lyell as president of the society for the year of its proceedings inaugurated at Bath; and, in response, Sir Charles displayed both tact and good taste in choosing the natural wonders of Bath for the theme of his introductory address. It seemed only fair that the thermal and mineral waters of that renowned city should be accepted by the most accomplished of geologists as his text; and it is not surprising, certainly not a matter of complaint, that, basing his discourse upon a phenomenon which no one has hitherto fully explained, he should have built up a magnificent conjectural superstructure. The plan upon which Sir Charles Lyell arranged the geologic records of the formation of the earth's crust was, to say the least, worthy of him and worthy of the scientific forecast of the present day; but whether it may be correctly designated as "Nature's plan" will, we suspect, be classed among the points to be disputed, especially by those who lay stress upon the admitted fact that the theories of geologists have, from the earliest dawn of the science, been as beautiful, and, alas! as evanescent, as the rainbow. But Sir Charles's address, interpreted as the conjecture of scientific genius as to the order of the several stages, according to which this globe was built up, was marvellously suggestive. We are not sure that it was not better suited to the purpose of the meeting than the customary synoptical survey of the progress of the sciences: it will turn out in effect, we believe, to have been more stimulative of further research. This is the main object for which the association meets. If it puts forth in the forefront of its profession the placing on record, and beyond all possibility of future loss, the acquisitions which have been made by science during the foregoing year, it will not be slow to admit that its anxiety to secure the past is with a view to the future, and that he best discharges the functions of president who most powerfully incites his fellow-members to renewed and still more earnest investigation.

That Bath should have felt itself flattered by the notion thus bestowed upon its physical researches was but natural. Probably it never before, even in the days of Beau Nash, realised so fully its own importance. Sir Charles Lyell made it, for the time being, the spot in which the nave and transept of the cathedral of science intersect each other—a sort of central spot from which to survey the geologic ages at a single and all-comprehending glance. Within view of the philosophic standpoint suggested by the hot springs rose up some of the vastest and most significant problems which the structure of the earth can furnish — problems the explanation of which must be sought in times so remote as to transcend the reach of present generations of men, and amongst agencies and phenomena of all but miraculous potency. The learned President handled these themes with his wonted grasp and breadth, and must have been followed, we should imagine, by his audience with more assured confidence when he traced the link of connection between volcanoes and hot springs, and accounted for the metalliferous veins in the rocks and for the mineral character of the waters in question by one and the same igneous theory, than when he surveyed the remoter ages of the physical history of the globe. The one theme naturally expanded into the other, for inasmuch as, according to the geological conclusions of the day, thermal and mineral springs mark the site of some great convulsion, it was quite en règle at Bath to glance at the nature and agencies of the principal changes which have left their empreintes upon the outer crust of the earth.

The scientific discoveries of the past year do not appear to have been numerous or brilliant. In no one of the sections so far as we have the means of estimating was any novel generalisation calculated to affect perceptibly the current of human affairs. The geological section, perhaps, came out as strong as any, in compliment to the President; but its produce, placed in juxtaposition with the abounding wealth of the inaugural address, made a meagre display. We can hardly be said to express surprise at Professor Phillips's observation that "inductive geology refuses to accept definite periods for phenomena produced under conditions not yet really determined," when we learn, on his high authority, that the time requisite for the cooling of the earth's crust from a state of fusion to its present condition has been estimated by Professor W. Thompson at the modest term of 98,000,000 years, whilst Professor Haughton finds, upon data that he adopts, that fully twenty-three hundred million years have elapsed during the process. We certainly wish that, in the face of these differences, the students of this most fascinating of sciences were a little less hasty in their generalisations, and a trifle less dogmatic in their expositions of them. We tread firmer ground under the guidance of Mr. C. Moore, who, in describing the geology of the south-west of England, informed his audience that on one estate alone of 40,000 acres, within the district, the land, which was wholly useless for agricultural purposes, contained ironstone enough, if converted into iron and sold at the present market price, to meet half pay off the National Debt.

The geographical and ethnological section, under the presidency of Sir Roderick Murchison, was expected to contribute largely to the fund of information and interest—and certainly the materials in the hands of its members were unusually rich. But on the first day's meeting a pervasive gloom was cast over its proceedings by the fatal accident which had befallen Captain Speke, one of its most successful and illustrious members. To have adjourned for the day—especially as the meeting was that at which Captain Speke intended to take prominent part—would have been more than a becoming expression of sorrow for his sudden death. Surely science does not necessarily dry up the springs of human sympathy, nor, we hope, can that high region be accessible to the fumes of envy or detraction.

The Bath printed noticeable statements distributed over what is reported of the other sections must, if our ordinary limits are to be preserved, be strung together, devoid of comment, in a few sentences. Our readers will not, we hope, be sorry to hear that the recently-instituted explosive, called gun-cotton, although it develops a bursting power six times as great as gunpowder, is condemned as too dangerous a compound for warlike purposes, but is strongly recommended to be used in the blasting of rocks. Under the head of zoology and botany much interesting information was imparted. The paper on acclimatisation was of considerable practical value, and especially in reference to the introduction of foreign animals into the colonies; while that on diet, besides furnishing useful hints to Government available for the better management of workhouses, schools, and gaols, will startle the disciples of Banting with a warning that in adopting his system to avoid the Scylla of obesity, they run great danger of the Charybdis of heart-disease. The attraction presented by the section of economic science and statistics was hardly equal this year to what it has sometimes been. One is glad, however, to learn that crime is decreasing in this kingdom, though that gladness is materially qualified by the statement that crimes of violence are more numerous than they were. But, during the five years just concluded, there have been fifty thousand fewer criminals—a fact traceable in part to the successful working of reformatory and industrial schools. We may also refer with gratification to the prospect Mr. Fairbairn has given us of having at last a successful and permanent Atlantic telegraph cable. That about to be laid between Ireland and Trinity Bay, Newfoundland, it is stated, will be able to bear a strain four times its own weight when laid at the bottom of the Atlantic.

On the whole, the British Association for the Advancement of Science took summation the week of its proceedings at Bath with satisfaction. Its meetings have fully reached the average of interest. Its members have been most hospitably entertained. Instructed and stimulated by mutual conference and free interchange of thought and knowledge, they will resume their scientific pursuits with fresh ardour, and put secute with even increased energy and success the noble task of winning from Nature such of her secrets as may be serviceable to man.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

The Duke of Cambridge passed through Paris on Saturday, and breakfasted with the Emperor.

Prince Napoleon has left Paris for his estate in Switzerland. The Empress is to be host to the latter while at the Imperial chateau at Compiègne in honour of Prince Humbert on his arrival from England on Wednesday.

An Imperial decree creates a professorship of political economy and public law in the Faculty of Law, at Paris. This decree is founded on a report which M. Rouher, the Minister of Public Instruction, has addressed to the Emperor.

The Ministry of Public Instruction has issued its injunctions to the heads of educational establishments prohibiting them henceforth from allowing the pupils under their charge to act plays or recite poetry, original or other, at the annual distribution of the prizes awarded to the long vacation.

The proclamation of the King of Pamphlona for 1864 took place at the Halle-Centrales, Paris, on Sunday morning, with the usual ceremonial. It is a remarkable production. The fair is to be held in the valley of the Loire, and sold for 108f.

Requisitions are now circulated that the French had been defeated, with heavy loss, at Victoria city by Cortinas. The French had landed at the mouth of the Rio Grande to operate against Matamoros. One of the terms of the convention signed at Soledad between France and Mexico, the latter Power was to pay over one million sterling yearly to the French army of occupation for the next forty—the terms after which it was to become chargeable to the new Empire.

SPAIN.

Marshal O'Donnell, as well as M. Mon, having failed to form a Ministry, Marshal Narvaez, at Queen Isabella's request, undertook the duty. Narvaez, after some years of ill-health, determined to stay at Turin and hold together a Cabinet ended in failure. The following is his list:—President of the Council (without portfolio), Marshal Narvaez; Minister for Foreign Affairs, Senor Llorente; War, Senor Cordova; Justice, Senor Lorenzo Arrazola; Marine, Senor Armero; Interior, Senor Gonzalez Bravo; Finance, Senor Mantilla; Commerce, Pelisic Works, Senor Calzado; Public Worship, Senor Seijas Lozano. The most distinguished member of the new Ministry is M. Gonzalez Bravo. A conciliatory policy has been announced, and the press prosecutions are stated to be suspended.

ITALY.

The Parliament has been summoned to meet on the 5th of October. The Turin journals discuss the question of the removal of the capital of Italy from Turin to Florence. The chief says that, if this removal were necessary to advance the solution of the Roman question, the Italian Government could not assume the responsibility of a refusal.

At Teramo, during evening a number of young men of the town were awoken, paraded the streets of Turin, shouting "Down with the Ministry!" The authorities witnessed this demonstration with indifference, and the assemblage subsequently dispersed of its own accord.

It is positively affirmed, both in Turin and Paris, that the French and Italian Governments have concluded a convention which provides that Rome shall be evacuated by the French garrison at the end of two years. The Papal authorities will be allowed that time to organise forces for their protection against encroachment, and the Italian Government will, it is asserted, undertake to protect the Pope's remaining territories against external invasion, and assume the burden of five sixths of the Pontifical debt.

PRUSSIA.

By the latest intelligence received from Potsdam we learn that her Royal Highness the Crown Princess of Prussia and the infant Prince are progressing in a favourable manner. On Friday evening the King held a Court in the Royal dangling-room, and on the previous day the Crown Prince received the congratulations of the Royal family. The Ministers and principal military officers paid their congratulatory visits on Friday.

SWITZERLAND.

The Federal Chambers have been opened, and the National Council has commenced the discussion of the Franco-Swiss treaty of commerce. The majority of the Committee propose the immediate ratification of the treaty, while the minority demands its postponement.

The Federal Magistrate in Geneva has issued a warrant for the arrest of M. James Fazy.

HOLLAND.

The Legislative Session of the Netherlands was opened at the Hague on Monday by the King. In his speech from the throne his Majesty said that the country and the colonies were alike in a prosperous state, that a number of public works were contemplated, and that bills for the abolition of local excise duties, with other important financial propositions, were being prepared and would be submitted. A project for the rearrangement of the customs tariff in the East India colonies is likewise to be laid before the Chamber.

GREECE.

In Monday's sitting of the National Assembly the abolition of the Senate was decided upon by a large majority. In future, therefore, one Chamber only will exist.

RUSSIA.

The Government has announced the promised measures for the conciliation of Poland. These are the creation of a University in Warsaw and the establishment of several schools. The use of the Polish language is to be preserved. The penal code is also somewhat modified, and corporal punishment is abolished.

The Pope has addressed an encyclical letter to the Polish bishops, organising the Russian Government for its persecution of his Catholic Church and arraigning it before Heaven and earth for its cruelties and excesses. The Pope also censures the confessions and banishments carried out in Poland, and especially the treatment of the Archbishop of Warsaw. At the same time the Pope does not fail to condemn the revolutionary movement in Poland, and he reminds the Catholics of their duty to obey all civil authorities.

AMERICA.

We have news, by the Jura and the Edinburgh, from New York to the 10th inst.

It was announced in New York that Mobile had surrendered to Admiral Farragut, and that the Confederate garrison had withdrawn into the interior; but the rumour proceeded from the enemies who had given rise to General Grant's army, and must be received with circumspection. It was, however, known in New York that Admiral Farragut had succeeded in getting up the channel which, which the Confederates had sunk in the channel over Dog River Bar.

General Sherman's report of the capture of Atlanta, Georgia, has been published. Sherman withdrew on the 30th ult. from around Atlanta and reached a point to strike the Macon road; Howard, with the right, being near Jonesboro'; Schofield, with the left, near Rough and Ready; and Thomas, with the centre, at Couch's. The Federals, finding the enemy at Jonesboro', intrenched themselves. Sherman, meeting with strong opposition along the road, advanced his left and centre to the railroad, and broke it from Rough and Ready down to Howard's left, near Jonesboro'. By the same movement Sherman interposed his army between Atlanta and that portion of the enemy intrenched at Jonesboro'. These Sherman made a general attack upon the enemy, capturing their works, ten guns, and 1000 prisoners. The Confederates retreated south in a strong fight. Sherman following them to their lines, near Lovejoy's Station. Hood, at Atlanta, finding Sherman on his only road of supply, and between him and part of his army, retreated during the night from Atlanta after blowing up the magazines. The 20th Corps of the Federal army then occupied the city. General Sherman reported, on the 1st inst., that he had pursued General Hood's army to the rear of Lovejoy's Station, thirty miles south of Atlanta, and had left there the Confederates intrenched. He had consequently withdrawn to Atlanta, as the great object of his campaign, the capture of that city, had been attained. The fruits of his successful operations, during which he had lost 1500 men, were twenty-seven guns and 3000 prisoners.

President Lincoln ordered a day of thanksgiving (kept on Sunday, the 11th inst.) for the victories at Atlanta and Mobile, and tendered his thanks to Admiral Farragut and General Sherman. Salutes were ordered in honour of the victories.

General Early was, at the latest accounts, still confronting General Sheridan in the Shenandoah Valley.

It is stated that General Lee had drawn large reinforcements from Early and had concentrated a great force for the purpose of attacking General Grant's left. Indeed, according to both Federal and Confederate accounts, both Grant and Lee were concentrating forces about Petersburg, and it is believed that a great battle for the possession of the Weldon Railway was imminent. A letter has been written by Grant declaring that the Confederates in the trenches talk their last man, and that, if the North continue undivided, the end of the war is not far distant.

General Gillam has surprised and killed the guerilla General Morgan, at Greenville, Tennessee, capturing his Staff.

The draught in New York and Brooklyn will not take place.

General M'Clellan has accepted the nomination of the Chicago Convention. He declares for the Union at all hazards, and says a spirit of conciliation and compromise must be exercised, but union is the one condition on which he will be willing to return to the Union should he received at once, with full constitutional rights. A large enthusiastic meeting for the ratification of M'Clellan's nomination to the presidency has been held in New York.

Secretary Seward made a speech at Auburn, New York, recently, in which he declared that the restoration of the Union depends upon the election of Mr. Lincoln; that slavery is no longer an issue of the war, and will not be revived; and that peace is restored; and that the Democratic party is aiding and abetting the rebellion. He also stated that no draught will be necessary, as the armies are being recruited as rapidly as required by volunteering.

It is reported that General Fremont has withdrawn his name as presidential candidate.

There had been extraordinary fluctuations and a great decline in the premium on gold at New York; and the last quotation was 228.

CANADA.

It is reported that the Canadian conference has decided that the union of the British North American provinces would be satisfactory, provided that the terms of alliance could be arranged.

INDIA.

The accounts from India are favourable. There was no disturbance of the general tranquillity of the raine were considerable, and the crops promising.

The Viceroy was to leave Simla at the end of September and be in Lahore the 1st of October, when it is understood that Sir R. Montgomery will resign, and Sir Herbert Edwardes succeed him as ruler of the Punjaub.

Cowasjee Jehangeer, Esq., has given a lac and twenty-five thousand rupees (£12,500) to defray the cost of supplying Bombay Island with water.

Conflicting rumours prevailed as to the state of affairs of Afghanistan, the latest being that the Ameer, notwithstanding the submission of his brothers, had made them prisoners and sent them to Cabool.

The Shah of Persia has sent an ultimatum regarding Herat to the Ameer, the rejection of which is to be followed by the advance of an army on Herat. There were great differences among the Hindoos as to the answer to be returned to the Governor-General's letter; but the peace party appears to have prevailed, and an apology is to be forwarded.

The Europeans are devastating the frontier of Persia and plundering the caravans. An expedition of 20,000 Persians has been ordered towards Asterabad to intercept them.

A Brunswick journal mentions that the bastinado has been abolished as a disciplinary punishment in the prisons of that duchy.

The Senate of Frankfort has acceded to the Israelitish Body a bill for the abolition of all religious disabilities. The measure has been referred by the last-named assembly to its committee on constitutional affairs.

The thirteenth congress of the Evangelical Church has taken place at Altenburg, in Saxony. About 600 persons were present, of whom half were foreigners.

Accounts have been received of the murder of Mr. Benjamin Campbell and his servant in Persia, whilst returning from a pleasure party to his home at Shemt. The motive was plunder, and every effort is being made to secure the murderers.

As the Mayor of New York was on a water excursion, one of his children was nearly overturned by the steam boat, but was saved by a man who jumped overboard, and snatched her until the arrival of the boat. The Mayor presented Mr. J. Johnson, her preserver, with a check for 1000 dollars, another of the party giving 250.

The Commander-in-Chief of the Austro-Prussian forces in Schleswig has issued a proclamation prohibiting the circulation of petitions and the collection of signatures under penalty of the rigorous infliction of martial law. This step is taken to prevent the getting up of any more addresses from the Northern Schleswigers praying that they may not be separated from Denmark.

The Observateur Catholique relates the following series of coincidences in the lives of two women named Cazeaux and Delcourag, who died last week at Lagord, near Rochelle. They were born on the same day, made their first communion on the same day, were betrothed on the same day, gave birth to their first child (a daughter) on the same day; they became widows on the same day, and almost at the same hour; and next they have completed the strange series by dying the same day and being buried on the same day.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

A most numerously attended public meeting was held on Tuesday evening at Taylor's Repository, Lambeth, to discuss the arrangements for the forthcoming annual London Working Men's Conference (National Society, Esq., was in the chair. The proceedings were altogether of a most satisfactory character.

During the last seven years Mr. H. E. Gurney has invited the whole of the teachers of the ragged-schools in London to spend a day with him at his seat at Nutfield. About 2200 of the teachers from 163 schools have partaken of that gentleman's hospitality. On Saturday last 490 teachers were thus entertained. (Our Number next week will contain an Engraving of this interesting scene.)

Wednesday being St. Matthew's Day, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and other members of the Corporation, proceeded to Christ's Hospital, for the purpose of hearing the sermon which is annually delivered by the Grecians who are about leaving the school for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Hale, and the subjects being treated with considerable ability. Prior to the ceremony the Corporation attended service in Little Church, Newgate-street, where a sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Haig Brown, Head Master of the Charterhouse.

Last week the births of 1868 children—557 boys and 311 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1854-63 the average number (corrected) was 1846.—The deaths registered in London declined from 1072, the number returned in the first week of September, to 1236 in the week that ended last Saturday. The average number, corrected for thirty-seventh week of ten years, 1854-63, is 1086; the exclusion of deaths from epidemic cholera in 1854, and with a correction for increase of population, 1092. The deaths from diarrhœa decreased from 198 and 152 in the two previous weeks to 81 last week. Those from measles, which were 108 and 92 in the first week of August, were 60 in the last week. Whooping-cough was fatal in only seventeen cases. Seventy-two deaths from scarlatina were registered, and sixteen from typhus. Seven deaths occurred by carriage accidents. Two women died at the age of 94 years, and one at 96.

A great fire broke out early on Monday morning in Gerrard-street West. It began in the newly-built premises of Messrs. Tapling, carpet manufacturers, upon the site of the old and very worn houses in the centre of the upper part of which is tenanted by Messrs. Hollaby and Co., warehousemen, Hollaby's Warehousemen Hall, over of one of which Messrs. Tapling suffered severely. The unsporting hall, of which nothing now remains but the four walls, was of fine proportions, being 60 ft. long by 30 ft. in width. It was consumed by portraits by the first masters of benefactors of the company, and a series of oiled drawings of the arms of the past and the emblazoned on the windows in stained glass. The lower portions of the walls were painted in oil, and the frieze of a fancy which has since been the western end of the hall was decorated with carved work by the famous Grinling Gibbons, the leading wood-carver of his time, executed at the time of the fire. On the northern side of the hall, and on the same floor, is a commodious reception room, immediately over the main entrance. It is a handsome room, with an organ-recess, overlooking the dining-hall, and approached from without on the hall by ochre-stone staircase. Over the hall are bedrooms, which had been lately repainted, has been seriously damaged by water, as has been much of the property in the premises; and a fine banner of the arms of the staircases is limited appears much injured by the action of the fire. The roof and ceiling of the hall, which was lofty, and lighted at the western end, have been entirely destroyed, and the hall is now open to the sky. All that remains of it is a few fragments of timbers which serve to show the elegance of its outline and design. Some 11 feet of the walls above have been saved, and two or three of the windows at the eastern end of the hall. The hall and offices are understood to be insured for £3000, but considerably more than that sum will be required for the damage. Soon after the fire broke out there were twelve engines, five working by steam, on the premises, and a full supply of them had been procured from the premises of Messrs. Tapling appears to have been hopeless from the first. The light inflammable materials of which the upper part of the building was erected burnt fiercely, and the fire spread from floor to floor with tremendous rapidity. The building is a fireproof one, but the fire had attacked it in which the fire was raging, the efforts of the firemen were at length directed to preventing the fire from spreading to the adjoining stock of materials and merchandise of various kinds, was of great value. The fire, however, happily spread in the direction of Messrs. Hollaby's Wood-street, lately erected for Mr. Hugh Jones, a warehouseman in a large way of business, but which escaped with the loss on the premises of Messrs. Tapling. This building has a frontage 110 ft. in width and about 100 ft. high, exclusive of the shafts. The stock and machinery destroyed is £150,000 in nine offices. The premises are numbered from 109 to 119 inclusive, and form part of the block of which that of No. 121 is injured, and the latter much damaged by water, as to also the stock in 161 and 164; 165, 166, and 167 is also much damaged. Building Nos. 168 and 169 are the last on the west of 168 and 169 are entirely destroyed and the stock damaged by water. At one time the whole front of the establishment in front of the new building caught fire, and some of it fell in a blazing mass, but doing no harm to the more substantial portions of the premises. The fire was extinguished by 10 o'clock, while all the more modern buildings immediately contiguous to that in which the fire originated have been scorched or injured, to a different extent, on the west door, and fronting Gresham-street, has entirely escaped. By four o'clock on Monday the fire had reached the premises of Messrs. Hollaby, which is the block northwards and for miles around. The flames shot high into the air, lighting up the dome of St. Paul's and all the surrounding objects. The coolness of the assurance offices put down the loss of property, exclusive of the buildings, at from £200 to £300,000.

LAW AND POLICE.—Frank Miller, who, as stated last week, has been brought from Australia in custody of police-officer of Mr. Bragg's, North London Railway in July last, left Liverpool in the care of the police last Saturday morning, and arrived at the Euston-square Station at midnight. Inasmuch crowd had gathered to see him. He was hurried into a police van, and conveyed at full speed, with a large number of people in pursuit, to Clerkenwell. On Monday he was examined at Bow-street, amidst a scene of extraordinary excitement. The magistrate's court was thronged to excess, and numbers of persons occupied seats on the bench were Prince Humbert of Italy and the Italian Ambassador. The chief prisoner's box was in front of Mr. Bragg's seat, who affirmed that the watch found in the prisoner's possession when he was arrested at Liverpool Victoria belonged to his brother. He was, however, unable to swear positively to the fact which the police officers also found among Miller's luggage. Subsequently, the magistrate remanded the prisoner for seven days, to the effect that the hat found in the railway carriage after the murder was his property; and that a pair of boots found upon the prisoner as the man who brought Mr. Bragg's watch-chain to his shop and exchanged it for another a few days after the murder of Mr. Briggs, were also remanded for a week.

The inquest on the body of Mr. Briggs was resumed on Tuesday. The coachman Matthews was the chief witness under examination. At the request of Mr. Bennet Collins, the prisoner's solicitor, he took Miller in the railway carriage, and supposed to be Miller's. He declared that the hat was more like Miller's than Mr. T. J. Briggs' produced. He was then asked if he would be able to give at four-and-a-half o'clock on the afternoon of the murder. He replied that he could not positively say. Mr. Bennet Collins handed the witness a watch, which he declared was the watch found in the prisoner's possession when he was arrested at Liverpool Victoria belonging to his brother. He was, however, unable to swear positively to the fact which the police officers also found among Miller's luggage. Subsequently, the solicitor regarded the evidence that was already given, to the effect that the hat found in the railway carriage after the murder was Miller's; and Mr. Bennet Collins, on behalf of the prisoner as the man who brought Mr. Briggs's watch-chain to his shop and exchanged it for another a few days after the murder of Mr. Briggs, was remanded for a week.

A crowd of persons, variously estimated at from 10,000 to 20,000, assembled on Monday morning in the open space in front of the Royal Exchange, and in the adjoining streets, to witness the ceremony of proclaiming Queen Victoria, Prince Albert, and the Prince of Wales, as the sovereign, consort, and heir-apparent of the realm. The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and other members of the Corporation, proceeded to Christ's Hospital, for the purpose of hearing the sermon which is annually delivered by the Grecians who are about leaving the school for the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Hale, and the subjects being treated with considerable ability. Prior to the ceremony the Corporation attended service in Little Church, Newgate-street, where a sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Haig Brown, Head Master of the Charterhouse.

Last week the births of 1868 children—557 boys and 311 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1854-63 the average number (corrected) was 1846.—The deaths registered in London declined from 1072, the number returned in the first week of September, to 1236 in the week that ended last Saturday. The average number, corrected for thirty-seventh week of ten years, 1854-63, is 1086; the exclusion of deaths from epidemic cholera in 1854, and with a correction for increase of population, 1092. The deaths from diarrhœa decreased from 198 and 152 in the two previous weeks to 81 last week. Those from measles, which were 108 and 92 in the first week of August, were 60 in the last week. Whooping-cough was fatal in only seventeen cases. Seventy-two deaths from scarlatina were registered, and sixteen from typhus. Seven deaths occurred by carriage accidents. Two women died at the age of 94 years, and one at 96.

A great fire broke out early on Monday morning in Gerrard-street West. It began in the newly-built premises of Messrs. Tapling, carpet manufacturers, upon the site of the old and very worn houses in the centre of the upper part of which is tenanted by Messrs. Hollaby and Co., warehousemen, Hollaby's Warehousemen Hall, over of one of which Messrs. Tapling suffered severely. The unsporting hall, of which nothing now remains but the four walls, was of fine proportions, being 60 ft. long by 30 ft. in width. It was consumed by portraits by the first masters of benefactors of the company, and a series of oiled drawings of the arms of the past and the emblazoned on the windows in stained glass. The lower portions of the walls were painted in oil, and the frieze of a fancy which has since been the western end of the hall was decorated with carved work by the famous Grinling Gibbons, the leading wood-carver of his time, executed at the time of the fire. On the northern side of the hall, and on the same floor, is a commodious reception room, immediately over the main entrance. It is a handsome room, with an organ-recess, overlooking the dining-hall, and approached from without on the hall by ochre-stone staircase. Over the hall are bedrooms, which had been lately repainted, has been seriously damaged by water, as has been much of the property in the premises; and a fine banner of the arms of the staircases is limited appears much injured by the action of the fire. The roof and ceiling of the hall, which was lofty, and lighted at the western end, have been entirely destroyed, and the hall is now open to the sky. All that remains of it is a few fragments of timbers which serve to show the elegance of its outline and design. Some 11 feet of the walls above have been saved, and two or three of the windows at the eastern end of the hall. The hall and offices are understood to be insured for £3000, but considerably more than that sum will be required for the damage. Soon after the fire broke out there were twelve engines, five working by steam, on the premises, and a full supply of them had been procured from the premises of Messrs. Tapling appears to have been hopeless from the first. The light inflammable materials of which the upper part of the building was erected burnt fiercely, and the fire spread from floor to floor with tremendous rapidity. The building is a fireproof one, but the fire had attacked it in which the fire was raging, the efforts of the firemen were at length directed to preventing the fire from spreading to the adjoining stock of materials and merchandise of various kinds, was of great value. The fire, however, happily spread in the direction of Messrs. Hollaby's Wood-street, lately erected for Mr. Hugh Jones, a warehouseman in a large way of business, but which escaped with the loss on the premises of Messrs. Tapling. ART IN BELGIUM.

A REMARKABLE exhibition of objects of art is now to be seen at Machlin (Malines), the ecclesiastical capital of Belgium. The collection has been formed on the occasion of the late Roman Catholic congress, but will not be concluded as an exhibition till the middle of the present month, the period advertised for closing, though it is now arranged to remain open till Oct. 15, to allow persons to examine the collection with a descriptive catalogue, an advantage not enjoyed by the first visitors. The delay in the completion of the display was caused by the reluctance of owners to part with their priceless treasures—articles many of them in daily use, or which have but now not quitted their resting-places for centuries.

The works exhibited consist of utensils, decorative objects, robes, and all the splendid paraphernalia employed in the offices of the Roman Catholic Church, which they range over the Mediæval, Renaissance, and Modern periods. A large comprise a considerable proportion of the most valued treasures of the many churches, corporations, and private collections of Belgium, and with a few have never before been publicly exhibited. It is to be regretted that so fine a collection is not to be seen in one of the noble mediæval halls for which Flanders is so famous, instead of, as it is, in the inconvenient rooms of an ordinary residence—in the Hotel Lecokercke, in the Rue de la Blanchisserie, where the effect the ensemble would have had is entirely sacrificed; and, of course, as a mere show, it would have been vastly more popular in Brussels or Antwerp. To the artist and the antiquary, however, the ancient, quaint, and picturesque see of the Belgian Primate presents attractions which are scarcely equalled by the capital or seaport.

In attempting to give some idea of a collection of this kind the difficulty of selection is enormous; for everywhere art-merit, historic interest, intrinsic or extrinsic value, compete for consideration, and, in many instances, in one and the same object. Thus, a chasuble, being so noting that there are Byzantine crucifixes of the earliest date, embellished with crystals; large processional crosses and pastoral staves, including one of ivory of the sixth century; diptychs of the eighth and ninth centuries; and monstrances, one of which was given by Henry VIII. to Holbein, the siege of Tournay. Among these, as among other objects d'art, the designs will often be found in combination with the execution, and vice versâ. Thus, a missal discovers there are two remarkably early examples from Tongres and Namur, that from the Sœurs de Notre Dame de Namur being marvellous for beauty and variety of design, material, and workmanship. There are a very fine chalice and a curiously beautiful altar-cover of Flemish make de Quay, and a chalice and chasuble of S. S. Thomas-à-Becket. The reliquaries are numerous, interesting, and artistic, though often very grotesque; though, on account of the odd forms they were made to contain; perhaps the most noteworthy being that of St. Chamelle, of Arras, of the twelfth century. The reliquary of the St. Epine—a name derived from the thorn supposed to form our Saviour's crown—was presented by Alexander of Scotland to St. Lambert. In 1568 one of the bishops gave it on the scaffold to the daughter of the Earl of Northumberland. It then passed to the English College at Watten, and, upon the suppression of religious houses, crossed into the hands of the Bishop of Gand. There is also a gold reliquary, adorned with precious stones and enamels, that once belonged to Marguerite de Flandre. The reliquary is said to contain wood from the true cross, portions of the veil of the Virgin, a tooth of St. Peter, &c. Of shrines there are many in gold and brass, bewilled and otherwise decorated, a few being of very early date. It would be impossible to enumerate here even the most remarkable specimens (being of the rare enamelled description), or nickle and repoussé work. There are numerous rings of shields, books of Gospels, and Missals, including that of Sir Thomas More's. A silver collar belonging to the goldsmith's guild of Ghent is remarkable for its treatment. A few richly-embroidered fabrics and priests' vestments there is a gorgeous display, though few are good in design. Among these is a tunic of St. Bridget, left by Pope Martin V. to the order of Alcantara, and a cope, the gift of Jeanne, Queen of Navarre, presented by Sixtus IV. to the Prince of Orange, is also exhibited.

Regarding the modern work, exhibited in the lower rooms, it is to be remarked that, while the Continental workmen is seen to very great advantage, the designs are generally inferior to the earlier specimens. The Belgian designer, like the nation generally, is distinguished by fecundity of imagination for the Renaissance. We should add that the formation of this exhibition is due to the exertions of an Englishman, settled in Belgium, the zealous antiquary, Mr. W. H. James Weal.

Whilst at Machlin there is this display of mediæval art, at Bruges is to be seen another exhibition of a somewhat novel character, and one—now that we are beginning to feel the national importance of monumental brasses—not the less conspicuous, and most—which should be repeated in this country. We allude to the international exhibition of cartoons, including those for stained glass, which is held in a temporary building of wood, situated at the rear of the Royal palace. The collection comprises many works of a remarkable character, most of them being the result of the competition of mural decorations, as is evident by the marks of the stylus or charcoal-holes which pierce the paper in all shapes and sizes, some are in long strips, for friezes; others are three-cornered, for spandrils; some are as large as the side of a room, for windows; and the pencil-drawings suited for a book illustration. The collection is highly instructive, from its practical nature and for the unusual facilities it affords for comparison; and the principle of the exhibition may be taken as a test. At the end of the grand salon is Kaulbach's fresco of the Reformation, where Martin Luther, standing in the centre, holds aloft the Bible, which sheds rays upon the heroes and worthies of the immediate period, our Saviour on the Cross appearing in prominent position in the foreground. Exhibit has two designs executed in a military station—"The Telegraph" and "The Encampment." The former exhibits many religious subjects: Guffens, of Antwerp, several historical incidents connected with the history of the city. The drawings used by Gerard for his decorations in the Church of Notre Dame de Lorette, Paris. Many other of the leading mural painters of the Netherlands, Germany, and France are also represented.

Of the Antwerp salon, also now open, it may be remarked that it is above the average, few of the pictures being of the Belgian school being absent. This exhibition, for arrangement and high general quality, is far superior to any which has been held under the Royal Academy. The Antwerp Academy is an ancient corporation, twice as old as our own; it exhibits many score works—and that freely, being kept open for study for about a month, which is more than our line in height. All are placed in black wooden boxes, which preserve the frames, and, by tending to isolate the pictures, increase their effect, and prevent the injurious influence of unfavourable juxtaposition. Of sculpture there is but little; but that little, however, is well displayed—a portion of it with the pictures, but somewhat removed from them to prevent violent contrast with the white marble. In architecture there are many interesting drawings. Some of these are tricked out "locally;" nor are ground plans or elevations excluded. There are many engravings and lithographs, and a variety of other media for the display of fine art, even to chased metal-work, the place of honour being given to a clock-case in repoussé relief—a most artistic performance, as vigorous as if from the hand of Quintin Matsys. The exhibition is well attended on week days and Sunday morning at one franc, though at the afternoon of the last-named day the admission is free.

The railway journey between New York and St. Louis—a distance of 1000 miles—is performed without change of carriage.

Professor Donati, the astronomer at Florence, announces the discovery of a new comet, being the third of the present year, in the constellation of Leo Minor. His motion is slow, which leads to the supposition that it is approaching the earth and sun, and is, therefore, not unlikely to appear more much larger dimensions than at present. Its actual appearance through the telescope is that of a very weak nebula. Its positions were as follow:—

	Mean T. Flor.	Right Ascension.	Declination.
Sept. 16	11h. 30m. 4s.	13h. 8m. 49·0s.	32 deg. 32 min. 47 sec.

M. Donati further states that the comet is moving northwards in the direction of the pole star, and will recede from the northern hemisphere, but is still visible to the southern one. We shall be able to see it again in January next by the aid of powerful telescopes.

JAPANESE GIRL PAINTING HER LIPS.

WANDERING MINSTRELS AT YOKOHAMA.

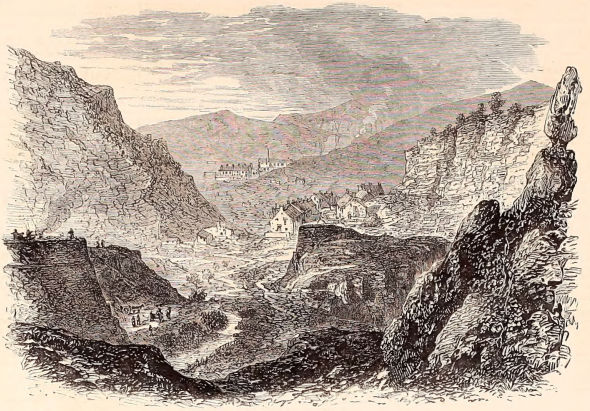
We have engraved a couple of sketches taken by Mr. C. Wirgman, our Special Artist at Yokohama, illustrative of the manners and customs of the Japanese.

The first represents a young girl painting her face after the usual daily bath. It is only the young and pretty in Japan, who ever think it worth while to practise these arts of adornment; a woman of mature age will always be found modest and simple in her attire. The girl seen in our Engraving takes extraordinary pains to improve the charms with which Nature has endowed her. She has first whitewashed her face and neck, then she tints her cheeks with lake, and paints her lips brilliantly with a mixture of crimson and gold, using a fine hair brush for that purpose. The effect is rather displeasing to the European eye, but if the Japanese admire it, we can only say it is a matter of taste. Notwithstanding this strange freak of fashion, the women of Japan are said to be very attractive. Their ordinary dress consists of a robe which covers the breast close up to the neck, or perhaps a little lower, according to the taste of the wearer, and reaches nearly down to the ground. It has loose sleeves, leaving the wrist free, and is confined by a shawl round the waist, the ends of the shawl being tied in a bow behind, and there hanging loose. They prefer quiet patterns and colours for the dress—grey, blue, or black striped silks; but the shawl is commonly of bright crimson; and their fine black hair is well set off by caps or veils of coloured gauze or crape. Their nails are carefully dyed, as well as the tips of their fingers, with a red pigment, which requires to be renewed every two or three days. The class of washerwomen, as may well be supposed, are exempted from this tribute to the custom of their sex. The Japanese females have almost as much liberty as those of Europe. Most of them can play on a musical instrument, like a guitar.

Our second Illustration represents a group of wandering musicians, who form a privileged corporation in Japan, and pursue their vocation without fear of the penalties imposed by Mr. Bass's Act. Their services are an indispensable part of the entertainment in all public or private festivities, and they are remunerated according to a legal tariff.

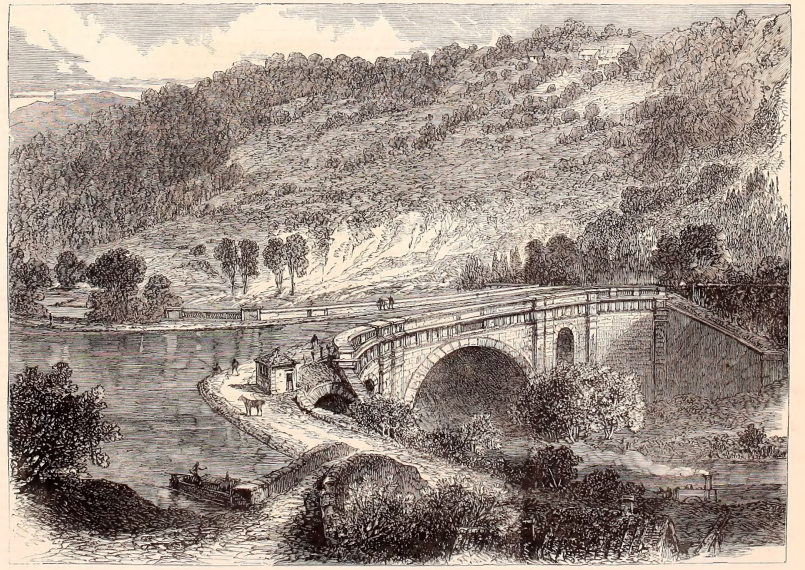
THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION AT BATH.

In our Journal of last week we commenced our report of the brilliant meeting of the British Association, which was brought to a close on Wednesday evening. The gathering has been, in point of numbers, 2037, as against 3334 at Newcastle-on-Tyne. This success has proved contrary to general anticipation. The Newcastle meeting undoubtedly presented local advantages, in point of population and manufacturing establishments, with which Bath cannot compare; but the beauty and celebrity of the city and the surrounding country, its comparatively easy railway distance from the metropolis, and its choice as a good surveying station for the geologist, especially in illustration of the Bath waters, have doubtless contributed to this unlooked-for result.



The inaugural address of the President, Sir Charles Lyell, was delivered in the New Theatre Royal, which was erected in the spring of last year upon the site of the former theatre, built by Mr. Dance, R.A., in 1805, and destroyed by fire in August, 1862. The present edifice was designed by Charles J. Phipps, F.S.A., architect; the auditory will seat commodiously 1750 persons; it has three tiers of boxes and galleries above the pit. The cost was about £11,000. The stage arrangements are elaborate and elegant. The house was crowded on the great evening meeting of the inauguration, many ladies being present. The more distinguished members of the association were seated on the stage, which was elegantly fitted up and lighted with gaseliers. Among those present on the stage were the Earl of Cork and Orrery, the American Minister, Lord Wrottesley, Sir William Armstrong, the Mayor of Bath, Sir Henry Rawlinson, Mr. Tite, M.P., Sir E. Head, Sir Roderick Murchison, Sir John Bowring, Mr. Fairbairn, Sir William Jardine, Sir E. Belcher, Professor Willis, Professor Phillips, Lord Enniskillen, Bishop Colenso, Archdeacon Browne, Captain Burton, Colonel Sykes, Mr. Glaisher, Mr. J. Crawford, Mr. Sylvester, Professor Miller, Mr. F. Galton, Dr. William Farr, Professor Rankine, Mr. Purdy, and others.

Sir Charles Lyell read his Address with excellent emphasis, and evidenced what Sir William Armstrong described as Sir Charles's talent of "imparting the charm of lucid and elegant language to the communication of ideas." The address was not so much a synoptical view of the progress of all branches of science as an independent contribution to one of them—namely, a monograph on the Bath Waters: their history, the geological theories of their origin, and the geological phenomena to which such agencies are believed to contribute—problems which depend for their solution on chemical inquiries of the greatest nicety. The following opening passages are picturesquely descriptive of Bath as a place of no ordinary interest to the cultivators of physical science:—



"What renders Bath a peculiar point of attraction to the student of natural phenomena is its thermal and mineral waters, to the sanitary powers of which the city has owed its origin and celebrity. The great volume and high temperature of these waters renders them not only unique in our island, but perhaps without a parallel in the rest of Europe, when we duly take into account their distance from the nearest region of violent earthquakes or of active or extinct volcanoes. The spot where they issue, as we learn from the researches of the historian and antiquary, was lonely and desert when the Romans first landed in this island; but in a few years it was converted into one of the chief cities of the newly-conquered province. On the site of the hot springs was a large morass, from which clouds of white vapour rose into the air; and there, first, was the spacious bath-room built, in a highly ornamental style of architecture, and decorated with columns, pilasters, and tesselated pavements. By its side was erected a splendid temple dedicated to Minerva, of which some statues and altars, with their inscriptions and ornate pillars, are still to be seen in the museum of this place. To these edifices the quarters of the garrison, and in the course of time the dwellings of new settlers, were added; and they were all encircled by a massive wall, the solid foundations of which still remain.

"A dense mass of soil and rubbish, from 10 ft. to 20 ft. thick, now

* LONDON: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1864.

THE pride felt by Great Britain for her Australian colonies is a pride sui generis. Despite the philosophers, there is such a thing as sentiment, and, with or without their permission, it is sometimes to be held in honour and to be taken into account as a principle of national action. We look upon our glorious colonies at the antipodes as something more than outlying marts of commerce, or establishments in connection with the great home at home. We regard the Australian colonists as our own children, settled, for their good, at a distance from us, but as part of the home circle, nevertheless; and we feel that they are as much interested in what goes on here as we are in their happiness and prosperity. Having watched their characters, we have, as early as possible, presented them every freedom. We know that they are perfectly able to take care of themselves, and we now interfere with them only with a little advice, and our control over their affairs is as nearly nominal as it is possible for control to be. But we cherish the idea of the home-tie, and we believe that it is as warmly cherished in Australia. Thousands in England who have constant communications with the colonies can testify that the Australians consider themselves as English as Yorkshiremen. We have lately heard that it war had broken out in Europe on the Polish question, and England had been a party to take a fierce rush was to have been made upon the Australian colonies. It is well that nothing of the kind took place, for though it would have been justifiable by the rules of martialists, the sentiment of which we have spoken would assuredly have come into play, and, rightly or wrongly, England would have inflicted a terrible vengeance for outrage on her almost unarmed children. The sales of Odessa might have atoned for those of Melbourne. A child, alone in the streets, may be ill-used by some great lout, but five minutes after the child's father has heard the news and found his stick, the assailant will probably be excellently well informed as to the difference between the sunny and the shady side of a good bamboo, law notwithstanding. It is fortunate for everybody that no such cause for wrath arose.

At this moment, however, it would seem that the good, we may say the affectionate, understanding between England and some of the colonies is endangered by a cause so utterly unworthy to produce grave results that it is difficult to deal with it seriously. The courier question, though existing on the side of officials here and not unnatural indignation at the antipodes, is actually being permitted to become an irritant; and, with judicious red-tape fostering, may even create an ill-feeling that may menace our relationship with the colonists. We regret that it is not easy to write on such a topic with gravity. That the existence of a few thousand scoundrels should by any possibility threaten a severance between this noble, old mother country and her magnificent offshoots is one of those preposterous concatenations of circumstances which only a perverse philosophy of the Darwinian type will it be easy for the writer half a century hence to believe that he has fully informed himself as to the origin of the present crisis, when he can trace it no higher than the door of a criminal gaol. But we need neither philosopher nor poet to tell us that dire results from little causes spring, and we know it to be a fact that nothing than either how great a matter a little fire kindleth. This little fire must be trampled out at once and for ever. We are rejoiced to hear that certain influential persons, not immediately connected with political action, but on that account more able to command the attention of political leaders on all sides, are giving earnest consideration to the subject, and that it will be dealt with as wise men deal with a necessity. The "platform" is, that quarrel with our glorious colonies is to be avoided at any price.

The large question of punishments opens to us a still larger one, that of reformation. It is impossible, within the compass of a single article, to enter at any length into the bearings of these questions, and it must suffice to note with curtness the character which they assume for the thoughtful among us. It is past controversy that the public mind is not only prepared but clamorous for a change in our penal system. We have all discovered at last that we have been going the wrong way to work. The cost of our system is awful; but we could bear it with a heavy taxation for a social object were it carried out with any reasonable success. But this is not so. Our goals are crowded, and thousands of children are being daily and nightly trained to become candidates for admission to those receptacles. To adopt the old and homely image, we are but seeking to stop the water from boiling over by taking some of it away instead of removing the vessel from the fire. No man can read the police and assize reports without feeling this. What will be demanded of Government—to state the case with a brevity for which the conditions of an article is the sufficient excuse—is, that the children of the crime-producing class be taken in hand to a very great extent, and with a boldness against which cant will rage, but rage in vain; and that what is the root of the evil is being humanely and fearlessly dealt with, the punishment of the adult—punishment at present so costly, uncertain, and useless—shall be rendered far sharper, shorter, and more decisive. The sentimental indulgence now extended to adult crime will have to be done away with altogether: a true and manly tenderness will be shown to the juvenile criminal, upon whom reformation will be forced, and our cities must cease to be the breeding nurseries of crime. We have at length discovered that we must begin at the right end.

But the adult criminal must be placed somewhere, and the problem affects our relationship with the colonies and our power to deal with early crime. We need our resources, and our vast and numerous goals, for reformatory purposes, and we cannot be ground down with taxes to maintain adult criminals in idle comfort. We want a cheap penal settlement—and dare to convey these whose reformation is hopeless. But it has come to be an admitted fact that we cannot have such a settlement. England is a little place, and has no room for such an establishment, and her colonists rightfully refuse to receive the vice-ridden.

In the present improved state of international relations, and in presence of the belief that the more international services that can be rendered the less chance of the madness and wickedness of war, what should prevent a wise Government from obtaining what it needs from Australia alike? As regards the present case, what solid objections can there exist to our attempting a convention or arrangement with another nation for our use of a foreign penal settlement? There is Russia, with a vast territory to which she remits her own criminals, but which at present she has the world only but sparsely populate. She has machinery in constant work, and the addition to her convicts of such as we could send her would be a trifle. We must pay her, of course; but calculations based upon the present terrible outcry show that if we chose to pay her a comparatively small subsidy, for the putinal support of certain Siberian colonies, she would be well remunerated, and we should be relieved from a tax which we feel doubly, because we feel that it is paid uselessly. We could transfer our convicts to her, and we should then be able to deal with incipient crime. The scheme which we have thus rapidly stated will be more fully presented ere long, but we thus state it chiefly because no time should be lost in effacing the idea that Chistendom will be allowed to see Scoundrelism breaking the link between England and Australia.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales continue at the Castle of Bernstorf.

Yesterday week the Prince took part in a battue in the deer park attached to the castle, and met with favorable sport. The battue party consisted partly in shooting foxes. His Royal Highness brought down a fine fox, and had two of the animals driven in range to him, and then set in gold for breastpin as a trophy of the day.

In the evening a grand reception was held by the Queen of Denmark, in the Christiansborg Palace, to which the Prince and Princess of Wales and the elite of society in Copenhagen were invited to meet the Prince and Princess. The guests began to arrive at eight o'clock. A considerable number of the Corps Diplomatique were present. Their Royal Highnesses arrived at the palace from Bernstorf at half-past eight. The guests, according to the Danish custom, having formed in a triple circle in the Bourroom received the King and Queen and the Royal party with a general obeisance. Taking opposite sides of the circle, the King and Queen, followed by the Prince and Princess, walked the entire length of the room, recognizing here to whom they were known, while those more removed in position were brought forward and introduced. The Princess wore a dress of a grey colour, covered with black lace, looped up with wreaths of coral and enamel. Head-dress, a scarlet hirt, studded with diamonds and pearls; diamond and pearl ornaments. Her Royal Highness also wore suspended from the left shoulder a medallion likeness of Queen Victoria set with brilliants. The Prince wore the uniform of the 16th Hussars, of which regiment he is Colonel. His Royal Highness wore the Danish order of the Elephant. The other Royal members present were the Crown Prince of Denmark, Princess Dagmar, the Landgrave of Hesse, Prince Carl of Glücksburg, Princess Marie of Anhalt, and Princess Hilda. After the various introductions had been made, the guests proceeded to the concert-room, where a selection of music was performed by the orchestra and company attached to the King's Theatre. At eleven o'clock the King and Queen led the way to the Rittersal, where supper was prepared for 150 guests. After supper the Royal party and remained some time in conversation. Divine service.

On Saturday last the Prince witnessed a grand review of the National Guard and of the troops in garrison.

On Sunday the Prince attended Divine service at the chapel of the Embassy. The Princess attended Divine service in the parish church of Genkerf.

The King and the Royal family, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Princess and Princess of Wales, visited the Exhibition at Copenhagen, on Tuesday evening. On their leaving the theatre loud cheers were given for the Prince and Princess of Wales.

When the British Association visited Bath many years since, the corporation of that city, with a view to the comfort of the members, made an excursion to inspect some objects of interest in the neighbourhood. Among the objects visited was a farm-house, which was considered worthy of notice. The proceedings of the section were altogether misunderstood by the farmer, who, on the appearance of the Lord Mayor (who attended to the party to the spot, was overheard to express his disappointment at the visit. "Why, I thought, Sir Roger, that you had been a lord, and there won't be no fight after all!" The natives were under the impression that the visitors belonged to a "fancy," and were a-for-fight in contemplation.

Lord Brougham, who is about to leave Brougham Hall to attend the Social Science meeting, completed his eighty-sixth year on Sunday.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

CAPTAIN CUTTLE, the antiquary, of whom Burns wrote some stanzas which will be immortal, collected certain humorous facts concerning a brother antiquary, Oldys, the compiler of the "Harleian Miscellany" and some time Norroy King-at-Arms. In his heraldic majesty, in addition to the quality of being a heavy drinker and fuddling himself with a pint of porter and a glass of gin, swallowed alternately, had real knowledge and some industry, and did in his time good work for the booksellers. Now, his method of writing a life was this: he took a sack, wrote on it the name of the person whose life he was engaged on, and, collecting any fact thereof, wrote it on a slip of paper and popped it into the sack. By the time that this rough portefeuille was distended the life was finished—which he had only to arrange in facts and the work was done. As many gentlemen who collect items of news for the London papers can testify, this would be a capital how to gather or retain them during their country tours, might I suggest to them the simple method of keeping a little receptacle, after the manner of his majesty William Oldys, Norroy King-at-Arms, stuck on the back of their knapsacks?

And so says Captain Spike, after so many travels, after shooting lions and laying before the feet of savage kings the heads of enormous rhinoceroses, such as only bad Europeans have attained, has fallen a victim to his own heedlessness whilst engaged in the chase of a partridge! It is a fine time and manner that makes death rad and inappropriate. "Expended Hannibalem!" writes Juvenal. "How many pounds weight will be that of that great commander weigh, and how did he die?" The life which had plagued Rome so much, which had disturbed all Roman kind, was brought to an end, not by swords, bones, spears, nor darts, but by "a big unlucky stone." Cannot we, then, and Johnson, in his fine imitation of that magnificent satire, applies the story to Charles XII., and tells us that hostile thousands did express their conquerors to death, but that

A petty fortress, and a dubious hand.

Truly happy are they who are so in the occasion of their deaths; who die, like Sidney, Wolfe, or Nelson, at the crowning point of their glory. Certain doctors of medicine, as well as doctors of divinity, are running about with papers to be signed, assisting upon the harmony of Scripture and Science. With the latter we have little to say, but not to pinch, warp, or scrape it, they do not harmonise, a perfect and imperfect thing very seldom will do so; and Sir J. Herschel and Sir John Herschel are saying so, quite right in their spirit, too, in protesting against their assertion being construed into the assertion that they are not religious or infidel. With what, may we ask, is Scripture to harmonise? With past science, which is exploded; present, which is changing; or future, which is unknown? We wish those doctors, so anxious to rid themselves of the old imputation against them, would remember the epigram and let matters alone. After all, the Scriptures are twofold in their truth, learned dispute, whilst Christian, Hopeful, and Mr. Greatheart still march unmolestedly through "Vanity Fair."

We have had often cause enough to find fault with the "complete tailor-system," as exhibited by Messrs. Russell, and we have taken the opportunity thus afforded often enough to make it impossible for us to give a hearty approval where approval is due to that Foreign Secretary whose policy has been the theme of our praise and admiration now only in one letter. But it is peculiar to Earl Russell that, just as everyone else is getting hopelessly rotted by his Sabine farm, or vapourised only in re-editing his "Life of Moore," he turns up with a brilliant flash which pleases everybody. He is like a bin of doubtful portwine when you think of it as hospital or chemist's, but when you fill your wine merchant, you hit upon a bottle of "old crusty" which is admirable. Lord Russell has hit his right nail on the head this bottle. It will please every Englishman, because it is dignified, manly, and plain-spoken. It can offend none, because it was called for—nay, demanded. Sam Weller talks somewhere about "drawing it mild, winkle out with a crooked pin;" and so M. Bismark "coaxes out" Earl Russell's opinion. He hopes that the British Government "will not fail to recognise the moderation and placidity which have been displayed by the two Powers," and so on, and so on, and then, and then, and he rushes to his ink-bottle and produces a letter which is crushing from its simplicity and its truth. We hope that Messrs. Beust and Bismark are satisfied. Placidity and moderation are hardly the qualities to be claimed for Austria and Prussia under the circumstances. "There," says a highwayman in one of Fielding's minor pieces, when, after robbing a traveller of some hundreds, his watch, sword, shoebuckles and diamonds, he leaves him an old coat and sixpence, "there, drink my health for a generous fellow, and be hanged to you." Can we blame the Austrian Envoy to see the generosity?

The interminable Irish question has produced lately two very sensible and good letters out of a correspondence which are printed every year on the subject. One is from an Irish landlord, who—we take it in the kind, and exceedingly like the whitest of swans—declares that there is really no cause for all the talk about Ireland's misery, and everywhere she is prospering, that he peasants are getting good wages, and that life is cheap and comfortable. The other is from England, and that if landlords will only live six months out of the twelve on their estates, and try to cultivate the affections of the peasants as well as potatoes, they will make themselves and their tenants happy and prosperous. The other is from Mr. Thomas Hunley, and takes that view of the question which we have put forward in this paper. Mr. Hunley—namely, that the Queen or part of the Royal family should frequently visit Ireland, and that the Prince should be amongst the first who should make them feel that they were one with her Scotch and English subjects. Mr. Hunley believes that the lord lieutenancy should be abolished, and that to keep up a difference, and to make it appear that Ireland is a conquered country. There is much to be said upon this point. Lord Carlisle, however, with merely nominal duties, would, perhaps, form an excellent connecting medium between the extremes in the abolition of the office.

When our country readers are looking at our pictures after a late dinner or an early tea, Drury Lane will be reopened with the legitimate drama, and Shakspeare. So, for the present, thousands time, triumphant at the "Lane." Mr. Phelps has been reinforced by his old companions, Messrs. Ryder, Graham, Cooper, and "Henry IV." Part I., will be produced with unusual splendour. Mr. Creswick intends, we hear, to give several new readings to his Hotspur, and the fiery Percy will appear somewhat less brusque and blatant than heretofore. Other theatres are opening one by one; the pantomimes will soon be upon us, and Mr. Charles Dickens, who always on the look-out for effects and jokes is writing his pantomimes, other authors will be writing theirs. Meanwhile besides the evenings draw in; pleasant-shooting begins on Monday week; and we are cheered by various indications that summer is past, and that winter will soon be here. Luckily, the weather-prophets are "wrong again," and we are not pinched by cold nor dodged by ice, as we were threatened to be.

A correspondent from Blackheath kindly sets us right in a quotation which we had evidently got wrong. We quoted from our memories when we had omitted the word "late." Wordsworth, not Tennyson, was the author quoted.

We have received a letter from Messrs. Moxon which we print, although our readers will at once see that our words "we hear it" should be "it is already known abroad," and already printed by the Continental editions of Tauchnitz and others, and, not concerning the English market, could have no reference to the English printer or stationer.

SIR,—The paragraph in your last week's issue which states that the laureate's new work was in print abroad is so absolutely untrue, and so unfair to our printer and stationer, that we beg you will allow us to contradict it.

A very large edition indeed was printed of "Enoch Arden" in order to anticipate public favour. This was entirely satisfied before one copy was issued, and in consequence was the additional character, that, owing to its unusual length, it was very material, therefore, to a private remunerative calculation, that the publication of the stationer should require, after the exhaustion of the first impression, a few days' preparation, to the end that the entire country might be simultaneously and importunely supplied.

It is only due to add that, calculating the time it has been issued, although Mr. Tennyson's present work had a larger circulation than any book ever published, very demand for it has been met, and such a number is now in reserve as will, we hope, prevent any future delay or disappointment.

We are, Sir, your obedient servants, separates the level on which the present city stands from the level of the ancient Aquæ Solis of the Romans. Digging through this mass of heterogeneous materials, coins and coffins of the Saxon period have been found; and lower down, beginning at the depth of from 12 ft. to 15 ft. from the surface, coins have been disinterred of Imperial Rome, bearing dates from the reign of Claudius to that of Maximus in the fifth century. Beneath the whole are occasionally seen tesselated pavements still retaining their bright colours, one of which, on the site of the Mineral-water Hospital, is still carefully preserved, affording us an opportunity of gauging the difference of level of ancient and modern Bath.
MOXON AND CO.

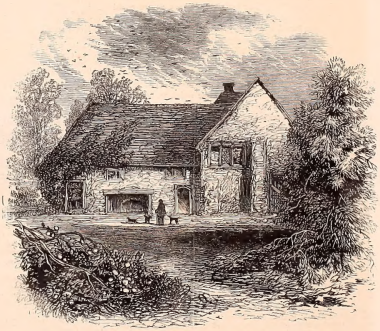
"On the slopes and summits of the picturesque hills in the neighbourhood rose many a Roman villa, to trace the boundaries of which and to bring to light the treasures of art concealed in them are tasks which have of late years amply rewarded the researches of Mr. Scarth and other learned antiquaries. No wonder that on this favoured spot we should meet with so many memorials of former greatness, when we reflect on the length of time during which the Imperial troops and rich colonists of a highly-civilised people sojourned here, having held undisturbed possession of the country for as many years as have elapsed from the first discovery of America to our own times."



Sir Charles Lyell then drew a comparison between the hot spring and the volcano, adding "the thermal waters of Bath are far from being conspicuous among European hot springs for the quantity of mineral matter contained in them in proportion to the water which acts as a solvent; yet Professor Ramsay has calculated that if the sulphates of lime and of soda, and the chlorides of sodium and magnesium, and the other mineral ingredients which they contain, were solidified, they would form in one year a square column 9 ft. in diameter, and no less than 140 ft. in height. All this matter is now quietly conveyed by a stream of limpid water, in an invisible form, to the Avon, and by the Avon to the sea; but if, instead of being thus removed, it were deposited around the orifice of eruption, like the siliceous layers

Sir Charles Lyell then referred to the temperature of the Bath waters—117° to 120° Fahr.—as unexceptionally high, allowing for the great distance of Bath from the nearest region of actively extinct volcanoes and of violent earthquakes; adding that we may well suppose that England was often more widely shaken than now; and such shocks as that of October last, the second and rocking motion of which caused so great a sensation as it traversed the southern part of the Island, and seems to have been particularly violent in Herefordshire, may only be a languid reminder to us of a force of which the energy has been gradually dying out. Referring to the large fissures and the placement of the rocks, as laid down in the Ordnance map, the Bath springs, like most other thermal waters, must find their way to some great crevice or fissure which took place in the crust of the earth at some former period, perhaps not in very recent geological times, and which may be filled with sand, gravel, sandstone, pebbles, shells, and detritus. It is impossible not to suspect that the wonderful energies of some mineral springs, both cold and thermal, in casting disease, which no artificially-prepared waters have as yet been able to excel, may be connected with the presence of iodine or some of the substances before previously unknown; and some of the newly-found ingredients, when procured in larger quantities, may prove more active and more capable of combating diseases which have hitherto baffled all human skill. Sir Charles Lyell then pointed out that the springs of Bath, as well as those of the Great Clifford Copper-mine is hardly less copious and somewhat less hot than those at Bath; and that the temperature of the water in the mine was 78° Fahr. Sir Charles believes in "a relationship between the action of the internal heat of the earth and the saline matter which issues from hot springs and mineral waters; and that, although the springs are generally viewed as meteoric waters, yet that, although precipitated from in vapour, they are the result of long filtration. Another theory ascribes to hydro-thermal processes in the metamorphism of sedimentary rocks, produced, not by intense heat, but by a low degree of temperature, aided by water and other mineral ingredients supported by the Roman aqueducts at Plombières, showing that hot springs are, in some cases, slowly dropping certain kinds of stone, which afford chemical analyses never before suspected. The forces of the action of hot springs on the interior of the earth is inconceivable. It is true we can only speculate of strata which, as evidenced by marine shells, is nowhere so obvious as in Wales, where parts of them are in one place contorted and in another broken and riven. A considerable portion of the President's address was then occupied by the glacial period, from which pressure we exclude, in our Journal of last week.

SECTIONAL MEETINGS.—THURSDAY WEEK.

On Thursday morning the sectional meetings commenced. In Section A (Mathematical and Physical) Dr. Hinkler read a paper on the Sensitive Flame; and in it he described the number and brilliancy of the fireballs that have appeared in the past year. Their height was from 50 to 100 miles above the spot which they traveled. The largest fireball described in the catalogue was seen on the night of May 3, 1863, which appeared to travel in a horizontal course from over the whole of the British Isles. Other papers were then read to the section.

Section B (Chemical Science) was opened by an address from the President (Dr. W. Odling, M.B.). He remarked with satisfaction on the remaining of the Museum of Economic Geology and its connection with manufacturing chemists. Dr. Gladstone's report of the committee on the Application of Gutta-percha and Indian-rubber to Useful Purposes was read, Mr. A. Smith, the manufacture, and, by experiments, showed how gruconium is a base which can be used commercially, and, moreover, that the sulphuret of which it was twisted into strands, the combustion became more gradual and regular. The general feeling in the meeting was that this was a valuable addition to stability, gruconium is superior to powder.

Among the other contributions was one on an able paper on the Utilisation of Town Sewage, by Dr. Henry Bird; and Notes on Coal Gas Results (No.), but the paper which excited the greatest interest was that by Dr. Buchanan, on the Bath Waters, referring more to their chemical than their curative qualities. Last week we published an abstract of this paper.

Section C (Geology) was addressed by the President, Professor Phillips, who referred to Mr. Hoare's recent discovery of flint implements from the multitude of fossils of the late Triassic age, and to Mr. Sandberger having completed his great work on the strata on the Rhine, from Mayence to Aix-la-Chapelle.

Mr. W. Pengelly read his researches on the Geology of Devonshire with Antiquity of Man. The following facts were connected with the Antiquity of Man:—1. Stone implements in the Brixham cave, which have no pretensions to the character of implements of higher antiquity, not only than that of the cavern Kent-cave of the Britch stone period, but than that of the Roman period. In situ used as arctic flora in Devonshire, has seen engulfed rivers carry the carcasses of elephants, rhinoceros, and other animals, has seen caves have collected shell-fish on the old sea-beaches now 30 ft. above the reach of the highest tide, and has seen submarine forests and peat-beds under the workships of war now ride at anchor. Mr. Pengelly, in conclusion, pointed out various evidences of the slowly, apparently almost imperceptibly, changes in the soil of bone-caves and other places, which proved the vast antiquity of man. He, however, was convinced that the Brixham cave was not the work of art and not of nature. It had evidently been fashioned into its existing shape by blow of human hand, and contained relics of art. There were distinct traces of five hearths.

Dr. Spence said he had visited the district in company with Sir Charles Lyell and Colonel Wood, and their conclusions were entirely in accordance with those of Mr. Pengelly. Another communication was read from the late Sir Roderick Murchison's theory, promulgated many years ago, that the space between the Alps and the Dry sea was at one time filled with ice, had been discovered at Evesham. These interesting discoveries were recently made in the valley of the Avon, in the course of the gravel beds which contain the remains of extinct animals, such as the mammoth and the Irish elk. A skeleton of the latter had also been discovered at Mere; the remains of which, in a human soldier, as his sword was found by his side; and also a very beautiful ornament, which he, Mr. Pengelly, had in his own possession. Of limited interest was the president's paper upon the Measurement of Geological Time. Natural Governments, by Mr. Bates, examined the nature of their channels, or depositing sediments; the formation and growth of peat bogs; the filling up of lakes; and the formation of distinct geological horizons, as that in La Touche on the Lake of Geneva: this has been cut through by between 200 and 300 M. Delesse's paper, on examinations of the three successive epochs the actions of the torrent spread the religion of Roman conquest, the extent of which, as far as the valley of the Aar, in specie may be approximately calculated at 1000, 1500, and 4500 years ago. Before these "stone" periods, so that the earliest trace of man in Sardinia is shown into the period of the Nuraghes, which probably occurred in the mound. The age of the whole mound is estimated at 10,000 years. Mr. Pengelly recommended a small party to be sent to Sardinia to examine M. Moritz further to investigate the "Roman Layer."

Section D (Biology and Botany) was presided over by Dr. J. E. Gray, who made several suggestions for the improvement of public museums; then passed to the subject of animal and vegetable life, and to examinations of specimens in his generally, a failure—especially the introduction of salmon into the rivers of Australia, which had destroyed the fish of the rivers and streams. Dr. Gray, with respect to horseshoe as food, showed that horses could not be fattened for human consumption on grass alone, as was the case with oxen. Mr. Jeffreys read the Report of the Shetland Dredging Expedition, in the course of which 1000 species were obtained, many of which were previously not on the surface of the sea, they walked on the under surface of the water in much a manner as to be exhibited a number of species of the genus Halobates, a circumstance never before observed.

Section E (Geography), the president (Dr. Russell Smith, F.R.S.), gave an address on the present and future of geographical education, in which he reviewed the actual distinction in public institutions and in our universities, and the plan and method of outline of the study of geography.

In Section E (Geography and Ethnology) Sir Roderick Murchison presided, and delivered a long address, passing in review the great geographical discoveries of the past fourteen years and now in progress. "The extreme height of the mountains in the interior of Africa was first ascertained by Dr. Beke, and Sir Roderick, "we then learn that the northern frontier of British rule in India extends to within the influence of the Indus to the north of the whole height of the highest mountain in Intima. It had been supposed that one depression in the ocean would be found in the Himalayas, but the extensest heights of land, and the anticipation has been exceeded, for soundings in the South Atlantic, between Ascension and Africa, have given depths of more than 40,000 feet. If these measurements be reliable—for there is room for doubt—there is deeply hollowed out the surface of the sea at certain points far exceeds the heights of the loftiest mountains above it. Another and still more startling result is the discovery by Dr. Hooker of the dredging the bottom of the North Atlantic Sea, living star-fish were brought up from a depth of 2½ mile and a half, and very near the surface of the ocean, that was examined on the spot by Dr. Wallich."

In the course a discussion on colonisation, Mr. J. Dobbie, of Clifton, referred to a visit which he had paid to Hungary, and spoke not merely from his own observations, but also on the authority of Mr. Paget's publication as to the characteristics of the Magyars, one of the chief being their oblique eye, and which probably influenced their descent.

Selections were read from a lengthy paper, by Mr. Crawford, on the "Art, Migration of Nations," considering the climate and the soil as the causes of the hypothesis of the unity of man, and the doctrines of the many races which have existed in every land a number of distinct races. Mr. Crawford, Mr. Marthins, however, urged that such migrations were physically impossible, and spoke of it, and the misinterpretation of Scripture chiefly.

In Section F (Economic Science and Statistics) there was a goodly attendance of members, and there were a number of letters. Dr. Wilson was called to the chair, and in his address described the universal spread of statistical science. Mr. Saunders, Fourth this conclusion: "That the increase of crime on the whole of the country is in accordance with the increase of popular education."

Professor Levi read "Statistics of the Number and Occupation of Foreigners in England"—There were in England 84,000 foreigners in a total population of 20,700,000, or in the proportion of 0·41 foreigners for every 100 natives, or 296 British subjects for every foreigner. Nearly a fifth consisted of women, and generally foreigners were engaged in useful industries.

Section G (Mechanical Science) was presided over by Mr. Mawshaw, F.R.S. Mr. Fairbairn then read a paper "On the Mechanical Properties of the Atlantic Telegraph Cable," in which he detailed the results of the experiments which he, as a member of the scientific committee appointed by the Atlantic Telegraph Company, conducted in order to test the mechanical qualities of the cable now about to be laid in the Atlantic, between Ireland and Trinity Bay, Newfoundland. It was found from those experiments that the more the fibres or wire were brought into a state of tension the greater became its strength; and that the cable as now manufactured will be able to bear a strain four times its own weight when laid at the bottom of the Atlantic.

Admiral Sir E. Belcher then entered into an explanation of, and recommended the adoption of, the torpedo as used in the Confederate navy; and on this subject, in communication with that of iron-plated vessels, on which Captain Brantley Hunt, R.N., C.B., read a paper, in which he stated his opinion that no armour is capable of resisting the improved artillery of the day, and that therefore the floating armour of iron-plated vessels will only be a target for ships on the Warrior, to build smaller vessels as so many platforms for the mounting of the heaviest guns, and to employ the ram as the weapon. Sir Baldwin arrow afforded very great facility in the manœuvring of vessels.

On Thursday evening a conversazione was held in the Assembly Rooms, which was even more numerously attended than the inaugural meeting at the Guildhall. The Mayor, Alderman Hunt, and the Bath civic authorities were extremely interesting. The guests numbered 2100.

MEETINGS.—FRIDAY AND SATURDAY WEEK.

The sections resumed their sittings on Friday. In Section A the papers were chiefly those of a mathematical character, and not of general interest.

Section B.—The Rev. P. Browne read an interesting paper on the pneumatic transmission of letters, by which he proposed to do away with the cumbrous system of sorting the letters at present in use, and they were formed by drippings from the roof. There were also found in the cavern bones of elephant, rhinoceros, bear, and other animals, which probably had been washed in by the water running into the caves by lateral fissures. There were fears of ice and large masses of ice, and of the Irish elk, in the 70 ft. level.

In the Geological Section, Mr. C. Moore delivered an address on the Geology of the South-west of England, dwelling more especially on the Bath district. Mr. Moore stated that he had discovered a new kind of clay, or rather a clay that was new to him, in the neighbourhood of Bath, and that specimens had been sent out of a cutting of it he had been able to obtain more than a million of specimens, in addition to twenty-nine figures of Saurians, various kinds of reptile. He had discovered in these beds many scares that had never been previously found in the Bath beds. He had also found a new species and one kind of fish more in the rhetic bed. Mr. Moore then made some observations which will probably be read in full hereafter. Mr. Godwin-Austen, F.R.S., then lauded progressive field 40,000 acres of land, which for agricultural purposes was useless, but which, under proper management, would be most valuable. Supplying 40,000 acres by 30,000 the quantity of guanstone might be appropriated, and the result would be a rich pasture, and, as Mr. Godwin-Austen said, a rental price, would more than pay off the National Debt. Mr. Moore produced specimens about the neighbourhood of Bath, and Mr. Godwin-Austen said, when one stone was broken open not only was the cuttle-fish discovered, but also the ink-bag which it contained, and which, on the fluid being let out, that might be taken out of the ocean at the present day. He then produced a specimen of the ink-bag, and said that, although it was not considered to be perfect was it in shape that but for its colour it might have been handed to Sir Charles Lyell, who, after examining it, said that it was probably 10,000 years since it lived.

Professor Phillips, in the Section of Zoology and Botany and Physiology were not of any public interest, though valuable acquisitions to science.

In the Section of Economic Science and Statistics, Mr. Saunders, Jamble gave sympathy, the failed secession which had befallen Captain Speke, who had been lost in the interior of Africa, on account of the rebellion in America.

Professor Williamson, on behalf of the Chemical Section, bore testimony to the excellent manner in which Dr. Odling had performed his duties. Dr. Odling congratulated the section on their unanimity; and Captain Maury referred to the great importance which depends upon the Bath waters.

The Duke of Saint, who was well received, declared his full assent to the report of the committee, and said that it was the duty of the state to do all it could for science. It should be used with the Government to induce them to regulate that in all schools throughout the land the science of health should be taught. Every child should be subjected to the new system instead, of course, he proposed when the larger schools were built, and he hoped that the Government would do their duty.

Mr. Tite, M.P., said that, as an architect, he had lost a great deal to do in Parliament, and he was sorry to say that the Government had not been active in facilitating his operations, both to matters of minute measurement and economy. In the course of the last session he had been a member of the committee on the Patent Laws, and, in considering his address, remarked—

"The Patent Laws were in a most unsatisfactory state, and he was sorry that at all were founded on theory rather than on fact; and, although they alleged that such was the case, they were nevertheless dwelling under the same old instance of it."

Mr. Peter Barlow next read his paper on the power required to overcome the six inertia of railway trains, with a description of machine to propel trains into every variety of speed, and to stop them at will, with a calculation to the importance of making electro-magnetism the initialising power for setting the train in motion. He also read a paper on the Steam Fire-engine in America that the wheels did not skid, and a fifteen-ton engine was able to be drawn by a single horse.

The consideration of the question was further prosecuted in a paper read by Mr. W. Brown, C.E., "On the Resistance to Locomotion on Railways by Power," and in which he suggested, as a relief to the street traffic of the metropolis, the adoption of the system of rails on the roofs of houses.

The question of the best form of cable for use in submarine telegraphy, and of the best method of laying it down, was then discussed, and, after the consideration of the section by Captain Selwyn, who advocated the use of a straight instead of a spiral wire, and who also recommended the use of insulator, in preference to either gutta-percha or indiarubber.

In the evening Mr. Tite delivered a lecture on Wheels, in every attractive lecture "On the Mechanical Action of Light" to a crowded audience.

SECTIONAL MEETINGS AND EXCURSIONS.—LAST SATURDAY.

On Saturday the meetings of the sections were brought to a close, and the Association joining in excursions. In the Section of Geography and Ethnology, after the reading of papers, Mr. Galton, F.R.S., called the particular attention, detailing their expedition across the Rocky Mountains into British Columbia, through the Yellow Head Pass. Captain Speke, and Sir Roderick and Sir John Richardson, the celebrated Arctic explorer as one of a very daring and original character. Mr. Galton's paper, which has been very long, has been made known for the first time the geographical features of the upper region of the Thompson River, and of the adjacent parts of the country.

In the Section of Economic Science a paper was read on the "Mortality of Bath," which was followed by a paper upon the Statistics of Lunacy, remarkable for its great number of proposals and other nuisances.

THE EXCURSIONS TO FROME, BRUNSEY, AND HOLWELL.

Two hundred persons, on Saturday, accompanied Mr. C. Moore on the Excursion to the Mendip Rocks, near Frome, where occur the singular combinations of the Lias with the Oolites, and the remarkable fissures filled with fossiferous surfaces deposits of rhetics, liassic, and oolitic beds, and exhibiting in many instances very remarkable contortions. Mr. Moore's paper on this subject is really very meritorious views. The main purpose of the trip was geological; but the party, which was a very large one, was entertained at luncheon, which included the Roman villa near Whatley, with its fine pavement; and Lord Cork, Lord Ashburton, Sir Henry Holland, Sir Charles and Miss Lyell, and many others with splendid hospitality at Marston, in that part of the memoir. Dance of the old house we engrave a View. Roman and English coins have been found here. From Marston the party went to the Roman villa at Frome, where the head of a cuirassier was found, or in more recent times extended the terrace of the mansion house. Subsequently the party went to Holwell Cheese.

NUNNEY CASTLE.

At the distance of two miles from Frome is the picturesque village of Nunney. The old castle, of which we give an illustration, was erected by Sir Lovell family of De la Mere, and subsequently by Charles I. After a stubborn resistance it was destroyed by the Parliamentary forces, in 1431. The ruins, however, are still of considerable extent, and exhibit specimens of lower of great architectural beauty, are some remarkable monuments to the Lovell family.

VILLAGE OF HOLWELL.

The quarries of Holwell present a double interest for the geologist, in common with other hillsides along the Mendip Range, a district from which Mr. Moore has obtained a large number of interesting specimens, with which he has enriched the museum of the Bath Institution.

EXCURSION TO STANTON DREW.

There was, also, on Saturday an excursion, by a party of members of the association, noticeables, and ladies, to inspect the celebrated Druidical circles at Stanton Drew, eleven miles from Bath. The accompanying illustration represents the large temple, which occupies a somewhat central position between the two circles, which are from 110 to 120 yards—much larger than that of Stonehenge, which is about 100 ft. The diameters of the other two circles are 32 and 44 yards. The Druidical temple, formed of the largest stones, is seen in the foreground of the illustration.

In an orchard at no great distance from the Druidical circles are situate other remarkable remains, of which we give a separate illustration on the same page. The two larger blocks here represented, the one recumbent, and the other standing next, somewhat of the form of the blade of an axe, are called by the inhabitants of the district "The Chopper and Block."

From Stanton the excursionists proceeded to Radstock, to inspect the Countess Waldegrave's famous coal-mines. Here a sumptuous luncheon, with a profusion of delicious fruit, was provided for 250 guests, the Countess Waldegrave and the Right Hon. Chichester Fortescue, the brother of her lady ship, presiding. The health of the liberal and distinguished hosts were drank with enthusiasm. After the luncheon some visitors descended the pits.

BANQUET IN THE GUILDHALL.

In the evening the Mayor of Bath gave a magnificent banquet in the Guildhall to the president, Sir Charles Lyell, the vice-presidents, the presidential sections, and other distinguished members of the British Association. About 200 guests were present.

The cloth was kept down having been drunk, the Mayor gave the Healths of the Earl of Cork and Orrery, Sir C. Lyell, Sir W. Armstrong, and Mr. Tite, M.P.

The Duke of Saint Albans proposed the Health of the Bishop of Bath and Wells, with our hearty congratulations on his safe return to his native diocese. The Bishop of Bath and Wells returned thanks for the Health of the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who has taken part in this meeting of the Association.

The Duke of Saint Albans then proposed the Health of Sir Charles Lyell on behalf of himself and fellow-visitors for the host.

Several other healths were drunk, and the company separated.

SECTIONAL MEETINGS.—MONDAY.

The various sections resumed their sittings on Monday.

Colonel Sykes presided in Section A the report of the Balloon Committee, recommending that a grant of £100 be made to Mr. Glaisher and Mr. Coxwell. Committee of the balloon experiments was appointed to examine the electrical condition of the air at different heights, and to test the law of decrease of temperature, and to compare the constant variations in different states of the atmosphere. Mr. Glaisher declined but not until unanimously applied, which was repeated when the President thanked him for his able address.

In Section B the only paper read was by Mr. W. P. King, "On the Premature Decay of the Fresces in the Houses of Parliament, Its Cause and Remedy." He attributed it to the presence of sulphur in the mortar, which the damp brought to the surface in globules, and the only remedy he could suggest was increased warmth.

Sir Charles Lyell, in taking his seat in the Geological Section, pointed out its overwhelming importance. It was in his inaugural address—dealing in a statement that they had no published scientific account of the Wheal Clifford but springs, near Bolster's. He had visited it, and he now had before him specimens since by Mr. R. W. Fox, Mr. Rowsood, and Mr. Francis.

Sir Roderick I. Murchison, Bart., then read a paper on the French Colonizing Machine, which was exhibited. The President then produced a volume of life tables by the late Mr. Finlaison, the eminent actuary, the author of the machine by Mr. Chadwick. The tables showed the probabilities of living of the ratio of the population of each age in every age.

At three o'clock the general committee met in the Assembly Rooms, when the following invitations were received for the meetings of 1865:—For the meetings of the Association:—From Dundee for 1867; from Nottingham, Birmingham, Leicester, Leamington, and Rugby; from the Potteries, Keswick, and from Plymouth. After some discussion it was agreed that the next meeting of the Association should be at Nottingham, under the presidency of Professor Phillips.

In the evening Dr. Livingstone delivered, in the theatre, a Lecture on his Travels and Labours in Africa, which, on account of the great interest attending it, we give elsewhere in extenso.

SECTIONAL MEETINGS.—TUESDAY.

In Section C, Geology, a paper was read by Mr. Prestwich "On the Organic Remains in the Laurentian Rocks in Canada," by Sir W. Logan, Dr. Dawson, and Dr. Sterry Hunt, was read by Sir W. Logan. The discovery of the first traces of organic remains in the lower Laurentian rocks, being the earliest marks of organic life in the geological scale. The paper discussed the subject at considerable length, demonstrating that the objects discovered were Foraminifera. Several diagrams were exhibited, and specimens of rock were appended in the microscope. Doubts were expressed as to the correctness of Sir W. Logan's theory, but Sir Charles Lyell observed that they could not approach this subject with any bias that there was no organic structure in these rocks. He thought the discovery was one of the highest interest.

Mr. F. Pusey read a paper, "On the Grain and Flour imported into the United Kingdom from Abroad and its Corn Laws," in which he stated that, under free trade, we had received nearly six times as much as under the bad former state of the Corn Laws.

Mr. Tite, M.P., who was received with cheers, said he had prepared a paper which was read before the Institute of Civil Engineers last year at Newcastle, "On the Improvements in Ports." He was disposed to think that these improvements had not produced the commercial results which many of them from which might have been expected. In London, with all its disadvantages, the ratio of activity had increased by nearly four to 1000, while it was, on the average be taken over ten years; and thirteen to 10,000, if attention be confined to the last year.

In the Mechanical Section, Professor Rankine read a paper "On Some of the Services Rendered to Science by the Royal Navy." Naval Architecture to Ocean and River Steamers, with Suggestions of Rainsford Rudders in Bows and Stems;" and Captain Wilson's "Experiments on the Resistance of Ships of War," who proposes to neutralise his system to the practice on shore—the negative plan of Mr. Rainsford Rudder. Mr. Bates, resembles Section B the much heavier armour-plated ships the Artillery. Admiral Sir E. Belcher read a paper "On Improvements in Ordnance." Mr. Bates, C.E., on the Construction of Mode of construction adequate for containing with ordinary batteries, and in this personal the necessity of the Government dwelling upon the same. In conclusion, Sir Edward stated that condensed millboard, interposed in the harbour he had suggested, would be found to resist the heaviest projectile.

There was a grand floral fete today at the Sydney Gardens. The flowers were brilliant, and the display of vegetables large and fashionable.

A Microscopical Soiree was also held in the assembly-rooms, under the auspices of the Bath Microscopical Society, and was most brilliantly attended.

SECTIONAL MEETINGS.—WEDNESDAY.

Only five sections resembled this morning. In the Chemical Section, Mr. C. L. Eyre read a paper "On the Application of Coal Gas to Warming the Air," and described a machine employed for that purpose, with which Mr. Eyre had warmed the Lecture Room of the Royal Institution at a cost of 1s. having put the same effect as the old other machine without the danger.

Mr. W. Gee then described the system of sewage irrigation at Tottenham adopted at the Breakfast Union, Wilts, by "the dry way," with success; but, in the discussion, Professor Hoffman expressed opinion that this process only destroyed the value of sewage as manure, and that for agricultural purposes it was only available in the liquid form.

In Section D there was a large attendance to hear Mr. Frank Buckland explain "How Salmon Spawn and Fish Breed." The explanation was illustrated by drawings, in which the eggs are deposited, a stream of water being kept flowing through them until the young fish are hatched, when they escape into large basins furnished with hiders and other appurtenits to promote their growth. Mr. Buckland, C.E., Professor of Edinburgh University, then read a paper "On the Physiological Aspect of the Sewerage Question," in which in the general conclusion was, "that the best way of applying sewage to purposes to ease, it was a source of growth to the vegetable, and through that to the animal, and that the best way to obtain the extra available manure was in the Shire River, in which a very bad smell had no effect whatever on health, and that the best way to get rid of the smell was to prevent putrefaction from the presence of a bad smell there must be fever.

The general meeting was held in the assembly-room, when the accounts for the year were read and grants voted.

The closing general meeting was then held, when thanks were rated to the Mayor of Bath, the executive committee, local secretaries and treasurer, and others.

In the evening a grand banquet was given in the Guildhall by Mr. Tite, M.P., to the president, vice-presidents, presidents of sections, and distinguished members of the association. No guests.

The Mayor of Bath presided over the banquet, and an excursion to Clifton, and the Mayor of Bristol entertained the Association at dinner.

VIEW OF THE CITY OF BATH, FROM THE SOUTH-EAST.

We present a View of the city of Bath—which is published opportunely in this week, from the Royal Crescent—the property of the British Association. Though it would, at any other time, have been a very acceptable contribution to our Illustrations of "The Cities of the Plain," as the most beautiful city in England, as Bath was formerly esteemed—at a time when the fairest of our matters would be read and not a single Scotchman—is situated against the valley of the Avon and partly on the slopes of an amphitheatre of hills, where its terraces and crescents, with the fine architectural effect of the varieties of gardens and groves, afford a prospect of singular beauty. From the Abbey Church Tower, to the New Crescent which stands conspicuous above, and the tower of Mr. Beckford on Lansdowne-hill, the whole scene abounds with stately and architectural objects, and absence of those factory chimneys, with their smoke, which obscure the really grand features of some of our modern towns, and allows the view to be enjoyed without any impediment to the spectator.

CULTENEY BRIDGE.

This remarkable bridge, built in 1779, is named from its giving access to Cultenay-street and the Holburne Museum, and here put from eastern to Batlwick parish. From the parallel lines of houses which are built on either side of it, and the misinterpretation of the view, it has, in consequence, a stronger would pass along Bridge-street monotonous of his crossing the Avon which flows below it. It is from before that the character of the bridge is—as our Illustration—is seen to advantage. It may be styled the Rialto of Bath, and has a most Italian and picturesque appearance.

AQUEDUCT AT LIMPLEY STOKE.

The aqueduct of the Kennet and Avon Canal, over the River Avon, about a mile from Limpley Stoke and three miles from Bath, is greatly admired for the beauty of its elevation. It is the work of the late John Rennie. The engraving which we give from a sketch taken after the completion of the bridge since his time increased, for not only does it carry the waters of the Avon and Kennet Canal across the vale of the Avon, but it also forms a road which flows the Avon, and through a tunnel and across the line of the Bath and Frome Railway. Beneath the high-backed bridge in the foreground of our Illustration lies the junction of the Somerset Coal Canal with that of the Kennet and Avon.

LECTURE BY DR. LIVINGSTONE.

On Monday evening the Bath Theatre was crowded by members of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, anxious to hear the lecture announced by Dr. Livingstone on his travels and labours in Africa.

Sir R. Murchison stated that the assistant general secretary, Mr. Griffiths, had made such excellent arrangements that while Dr. Livingstone was lecturing there his lecture would be read in another place to many hundreds of the association who could not find room in the theatre, and that when the general assembly was adjourned his friend would move to the other room and there thank that assembly, which was sure to do him honour.

Dr. Livingstone then delivered the following lecture :—

In order that the remarks I have to offer may be clearly understood, it is necessary to call to mind some things which took place previous to the Zambesi expedition being sent out, and most of you are no doubt aware that, previous to the discovery of Lake Nyassni and the well-watered country in which it is the chief dwell, the idea prevailed that a large part of the interior of Africa was composed of vast sandy deserts, into which rivers run and water fails. In a journey from sea to sea across the continent, a journey north of the lake first discovered, it was found that there, too, the country was well watered. Large towns of well-built houses were entered by force, and occupied with a considerable population. We had, then, the form of the continent ascertained to be an elevated plateau, sloping towards the centre, with features at the sides, by which the rivers escaped to the sea; and this great fact in physical geography was now to be corrected by without mentioning the remarkable hypothesis by which the distinguished president of the Royal Geographical Society (Sir R. Murchison) had accounted for it before it was verified by actual observation of the altitudes of the country and courses of the river. It was published in one of his famous anniversary addresses; and he has been equally happy in his last address in pointing out the strict geological condition of the interior of this continent, and assigning the oldest in the world—a fact we who were on the spot could but dimly guess. But he seems to have the happy faculty of collecting facts more readily and concentrating them into a focus in a way no one else can accomplish. We remained in only after he had made it all plain by the light of his theory. Then followed the famous travels of Dr. Barth and Francis Galton; the most interesting discoveries of Lakes Ngami and Victoria Nyanza by Captain Speke and Burton and Captain Speke—whose loss we all now so deeply deplore; and, again, of Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa; the discovery of both of which was made several others; but, last of all, the grand discovery of the main source of the Nile, which every Englishman must be proud to know was made entirely by our countrymen Speke and Grant.

In all this the attention of the main object in view has not been merely to discover objects of mere days' wonder, to gaze and be gazed at by barbarians—I would not give a fig to discover a new lake with twelve—but to open a highway to the west coast, to find a path to the sea, whereby lawful commerce might be introduced, and the unspeakable curse of the slave trade destroyed. In observing the decided influence that what is known as Lord Palmerston's policy exhibited among the tribes in the centre of the continent, slavery had been abolished, and that the slave trade had been so far suppressed as to be spoken of as a thing of the past; that the population had increased from 4,000 to 200,000 in every good-sized town between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000, and 1,000,000 who was in perfect security, and that in every one of these missions had been established, with schools in which 12,000 pupils were taught the arts of peace and property were secured to the natives, and a trade of peace established in large portions of the interior; and all this was at a time when the slave-trade operated with its usual severity on the west coast and in some in the eastern—that our critics had done nothing but aggravate the evils of the slave trade.

Well, with this knowledge what I wished to see was the entrance to the Zambesi from the west, and there I found the country sealed up. The same effect has been made by a similar cause on the east coast, but, in consequence of foreigners being debarred from entering the country, neither traders nor missionaries had penetrated to the interior. The one was only in a little ivory, and gold-dust, and slaves—just as it was on the west coast before Lord Palmerston's policy came into operation. missions had been established, with schools in which 12,000 pupils were taught the arts of peace and property were secured to the natives, and a trade of peace established in large portions of the interior; and all this was at a time when the slave trade operated with its usual severity on the west coast and in some in the eastern—that our critics had done nothing but aggravate the evils of the slave trade.

Well, with this knowledge what I wished to see was the entrance to the Zambesi from the west, and there I found the country sealed up. The same effect has been made by a similar cause on the east coast, but, in consequence of foreigners being debarred from entering the country, neither traders nor missionaries had penetrated to the interior. The one was only in a little ivory, and gold-dust, and slaves—just as it was on the west coast before Lord Palmerston's policy came into operation. I knew the natives to be almost all fond of trading, and, when away from the influence of the slave trade, ready to engage in the legal trade of ivory and cotton and other products widely cultivated. It therefore appeared to me that if I could open this region to lawful commerce I should encourage the efforts of our cruisers, in the same way as has been done by traders and missionaries in the west coast, and, perhaps, be the means of opening a path to England. To accomplish this was the main object of the Zambesi expedition; and in speaking of what was then done I shall be understood that I, Dr. Livingstone, and others composed it; and when I speak in the plural number I mean those who would be best qualified to form a just opinion of the matters with which my companions worked. They were never donated by difficulties, nor dangers, nor hard fare, and I believe my services required to the full capacity might be relied on to perform their duty.

The first journey we made was to the eastern entrance to the Zambesi, about a degree west of the Quilimane River, which had always been represented as the mouth of the Zambesi; in order, as some misinformed, that the men-of-war might be induced to watch the false mouth while slaves were quietly shipped from the real mouth. This mistake has been fully exposed in a map by the Colonial Minister of Portugal. On ascending the Zambesi we found that the Portuguese authorities, to whom their Government had kindly commended us, had nearly all fled down to the seacoast, and the country was in the hands of the natives, many of whom had never before or saw had been slaves. As they were all quite friendly with us we proceeded to our work, and ascended the river in a little steamer, which, though built here in of steel plates—a material never before tried—and with an engine and boiler, the invention of some shop, very near Lambeth Bridge, I suppose, manufactured of the country passed us with ease, and the people in them looked back, wondering what this puffing thing could mean. Some of the more timid thought it was a land animal swimming, and rushed at it in hopes of having a share. It was very far the first river I had seen which was free from rapids wide. During half the year the water is abundant and deep; during the other half, or the dry season, it is very shallow; but, with properly constructed vessels, much might be made of it during the whole of ordinary years.

We proceeded as soon as we could to the Kebrabasa Rapids, our attention having originally been to go up as far as the Great Victoria Falls and do what we could with the Makololo, but our steamer could not pass the rapids knot current. We then turned off to an affluent of the Zambesi, which flows into it about forty miles from its sea mouth, called the Shire. It was not known, was never explored by any European before. It flows in a valley about 200 miles long and twenty broad. Ranges of hills rise on the landscape on both sides, while the river itself winds excessively in many meanders. In one of these we found a native village in sight at one time. The population was very large; crowds of natives, armed with bows and arrows, were seen moving about, and as we passed in front many more would be collected. But they were decidedly we gave them no cause of offence, and they soon became friendly, and the women and children appeared. We had so far gained their confidence that I left the attendance of Murchison's Cutter on the river, and had I, presiding on foot to the N.N.E., discovered Lake Shirwa. This lake is said by the natives to have no outlet, and is probably the source of the water in which it abounds; it abounds in fish, hippotomi, and leeches. The scenery around is very beautiful, the mountains on the east rising to a height of 6000 or 7000 feet.

We now among the Mangania, a people who had not been visited by Europeans; and as I am often asked what sort of folk these savages are, I may answer, that as far as we have ever met, except kidnappers, they are not all cultivate the soil for their sustenance. Cultivating large tracts of land for grain, and the way of using the produce of it being called "beer," which is not very intoxicating, but when they consume large quantities they become a little muddled. When a family brews a large quantity, the friends and neighbours are invited to drink and bring their hoes with them. They let off their beer by merrily hoeing their neighbour's fields, and the whole party they consume large quantities, for the same object as our regular topers at home. We called on one village, and found that the people all began to hoe, seeing us the men tried to induce the women to run away, but the ladies, too, were all prepared for the drunkenness.

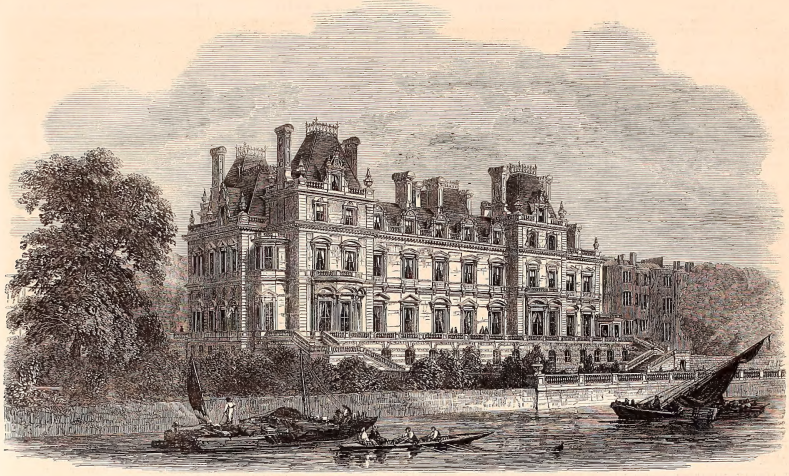
Wherever the tsetse exists the people possess no cattle, as this insect proves fatal to all domestic animals except the goat, man, and the wild species. Where the slave trade is unknown the cattle are the only cause of war. The Makololo will not make war for the sake of killing cattle; but if losing cattle in battle, and [illegible] and when the question is put, Why should you lift what does not belong to you? they answer, Why should those black cattle belong to Makololo (or black fellow) possess cattle if they can't defend them?

Having ascended the goodwill of the people below and adjacent to Magochion's Cutaract, we next proceeded further north, and discovered the Shire branch, a large fresh stream out to Lake Nyassa, about 40 miles in a direct above the cataracts. The country on each side of the river and lake rises by its whole height, seem ranges of mountains of from 3000 to 7000 feet, and ascended they turn out to be elevated plateaux, cool and well watered with streams. The people are very numerous, and, from the fertility and richness of the soil, are all more or less industrious, and employ much time between 2000 and 3000 feet) we had at 45 deg. to 50 deg. below. It felt as if iced. We had no trouble with the people. No dues were levied nor fees demanded, though the Mangania were quite independent in their bearing towards us, and strikingly different from what they afterwards became. Our operations were confined chiefly to gaining the friendships of the different tribes, and imparting what information we could with a view to induce them to cultivate cotton. Each family had its own cotton patch; some of these were of considerable extent; one field, close to Sadoine Cataract, I lately found to be old pieces on one side, and the cotton was of excellent quality, not requiring replanting oftener than once in three years, and no fear of injury by frost. On remonstrating with the chiefs against selling their people into slavery, they ratified themselves on the plea that some were sold except criminals. The crimes may not always be very great; but I conjecture, from the extreme

LECTURE BY DR. LIVINGSTONE.

On Monday evening the Bath Theatre was crowded by members of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, anxious to hear the lecture announced by Dr. Livingstone on his travels and labours in Africa.

Sir R. Murchison stated that the assistant general secretary, Mr. Griffiths, had made such excellent arrangements that while Dr. Livingstone was lecturing there his lecture would be read in another place to many hundreds of the association who could not find room in the theatre, and that when the general assembly was adjourned his friend would move to the other room and there thank that assembly, which was sure to do him honour.



Dr. Livingstone then delivered the following lecture :—

In order that the remarks I have to offer may be clearly understood, it is necessary to call to mind some things which took place previous to the Zambesi expedition being sent out, and most of you are no doubt aware that, previous to the discovery of Lake Nyassni and the well-watered country in which it is the chief dwell, the idea prevailed that a large part of the interior of Africa was composed of vast sandy deserts, into which rivers run and water fails. In a journey from sea to sea across the continent, a journey north of the lake first discovered, it was found that there, too, the country was well watered. Large towns of well-built houses were entered by force, and occupied with a considerable population. We had, then, the form of the continent ascertained to be an elevated plateau, sloping towards the centre, with features at the sides, by which the rivers escaped to the sea; and this great fact in physical geography was now to be corrected by without mentioning the remarkable hypothesis by which the distinguished president of the Royal Geographical Society (Sir R. Murchison) had accounted for it before it was verified by actual observation of the altitudes of the country and courses of the river. It was published in one of his famous anniversary addresses; and he has been equally happy in his last address in pointing out the strict geological condition of the interior of this continent, and assigning the oldest in the world—a fact we who were on the spot could but dimly guess. But he seems to have the happy faculty of collecting facts more readily and concentrating them into a focus in a way no one else can accomplish. We remained in only after he had made it all plain by the light of his theory. Then followed the famous travels of Dr. Barth and Francis Galton; the most interesting discoveries of Lakes Ngami and Victoria Nyanza by Captain Speke and Burton and Captain Speke—whose loss we all now so deeply deplore; and, again, of Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa; the discovery of both of which was made several others; but, last of all, the grand discovery of the main source of the Nile, which every Englishman must be proud to know was made entirely by our countrymen Speke and Grant.

In all this the attention of the main object in view has not been merely to discover objects of mere days' wonder, to gaze and be gazed at by barbarians—I would not give a fig to discover a new lake with twelve—but to open a highway to the west coast, to find a path to the sea, whereby lawful commerce might be introduced, and the unspeakable curse of the slave trade destroyed. In observing the decided influence that what is known as Lord Palmerston's policy exhibited among the tribes in the centre of the continent, slavery had been abolished, and that the slave trade had been so far suppressed as to be spoken of as a thing of the past; that the population had increased from 4,000 to 200,000 in every good-sized town between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000, and 1,000,000 who was in perfect security, and that in every one of these gone seasons. Two of the leading authors of our own day—Macaulay and Thackeray—have employed their graphic skill in describing the aspect of Tunbridge Wells as it appeared a hundred or a hundred and fifty years ago. We have no particular news to report just now from this agreeable inland watering-place, except the opening last week of a local "Exhibition of Industry and Art," for the benefit of the funds of the Belgrave Institute, in Cramp's Riding-school, near the railway station. The Engraving which we publish this week, though not an Illustration of the affair just mentioned, will serve to direct attention to the present aspect of Tunbridge Wells.

EMBARKATION AT CAPE COAST CASTLE OF THE TROOPS FROM THE ASHANTEE WAR.

WE are indebted to Dr. Eames, of H.M.S. Gladiator, for a sketch of the harbour or roads of Cape Coast Castle, taken during the embarkation of our troops lately engaged in the Ashantee War. The transport-vessel which awaits the boats, in readiness to convey the soldiery from this unhealthy station, is escorted by the Gladiator and Rattlesnake ships of war. The town consists, except a few European houses, of straggling lines of mud huts, with clusters of palm-trees and tamarind-trees; but the fortress, which is large and well-built, standing on a rock close to the sea, is the most conspicuous feature in our View. On the summit of the hill behind is the lighthouse and fort erected by Governor Maclean, the husband of "L. E. L.;" and Fort Victoria stands upon another eminence. The population of this town is about ten thousand. It is the capital of the British possessions on the Gold Coast, but subject to the Government of Sierra Leone. As a place of trade for palm-oil, ivory, and gold-dust, it is of some importance, though its climate makes it a very undesirable residence for persons of English birth.

DISASTROUS FIRE AT BILLINGHAY, LINCOLNSHIRE.

WE give a View of the ruins of a part of the village of Billinghay, which was destroyed by fire on Friday, the 9th inst. The fire, it seems, was caused by the sparks from a foul chimney falling upon the roof of a thatched hovel in a yard belonging to William Scott, wood-dealer. The wind at the time was blowing a gale from the west, and the burning straw was blown upon a thatched cottage belonging to Robert Newton, a carrier between Sleaford and Lincoln. This building was completely gutted, as well as the stable and carthouse, with other buildings. The flames extended across the road in an easterly direction and reached a row of cottages on the other side of the street. The Primitive Methodist Chapel was burnt, as well as nearly all the houses in the immediate neighbourhood of the fire. The loss will fall very heavily upon the sufferers, few of whom are insured; and, as they are generally of the poorer class, the result is most distressing. Nearly one hundred men, women, and children have to be accommodated with temporary lodgings in the village school-room.

RUINS OF THE VILLAGE OF BILLINGHAY, LINCOLNSHIRE, AFTER THE LATE FIRE.

MEMBERS OUT OF PARLIAMENT

To attempt to be original in the House of Commons is almost equivalent to political suicide. Originality there means that a man is impertinent enough to think for himself, and not to speak, move, and have his being in a party sense. Not even in the courts of law do you ever hear talkers so slavishly "following on the same side" as in that assembly; and this is true more especially of the so-called Conservative party. It seems to be laid down that their creed is so clear, so noble, so intelligible that any one who does not profess it and preach it in its integrity is necessarily afflicted with a bee in his political bonnet; and even if he believes himself in the most honest sentiments, in the best language, he is declared to be past understanding and impracticable. The real thing is to say "ditto to Mr. Disraeli" in as many words and as many votes as possible; and if you are not particularly observed, you are respected in the game—that is, you are not much noticed or cared for, which in an office can expect to be. It has been the fortune, good or ill, of Mr. Newdegate—a man who never was one of the tried disciplinarians of his party—to have found it necessary to take up an independent position in the House. It argues no little courage to do this. As we have already hinted, in that assembly originality is doubted in such a case, and incredulity as to motive and object is inevitable. It is presumed that a member who stands aloof is in the political market, that he is waiting to be bid for at some critical moment. He is, perhaps, pitied: certainly not trusted. Nevertheless and notwithstanding, in some matters a decisiveness of opinion peculiar to himself which does not invite popularity, Mr. Newdegate has shown unimpeachable and unimpeachable influence to political honesty. He is, strictly speaking, of no party, and his political doctrines seem based on philanthropy as much as on any principles of polity, technically so called. His Protestantism is, no doubt, ultra; but the old f

NATIONAL SPORTS.

EXCEPT as regards sales and general attendance, the Doncaster week was not so brilliant as we have known it. The result of the Champagne Stakes will not be quite the Derby betting, except to harden the position of Zamberi's stable-mate, Liddington; even at 40 to 1 no one seemed to care to touch an improving colt like Ardax; and the Doncaster Stakes and Cup were deprived of nearly all their interest by the absence of Blair Athol, who received such a kick on the knee while running for the St. Leger that he was sent home on Friday morning. This makes the fourth St. Leger out of five in succession that has been won by the stock of Stockwell. The pace was not great this year, and it is well that the ten were got to face the almost blinding rain, and that their jockeys, some of whom, as a rule, are absolutely rode in nothing but mere jockey costume, should have steered them as they did. Seventy is a pretty severe weight-carrying error to put upon a horse which he rode Butterby and Blair Athol at Epsom, showed, and he was quite equal to the occasion. The Cup (of which "an Engineer" was a winner) was run in a manner remarkable race, or, as many thought, null. Baron Rothschild did not send Hippolyta to make running for Hippolyta for love, or possibility of serving The Miner, and the consequence was that there was no pace worth speaking of till about a mile from home. This exactly suited The General, who had only to wait and outstride Hippolyta on the post. Hippolyta's chance was fairly disposed of by these tactics, and The Miner came with a rattling rush when asked to trying to come along from the hill, and was tremendously spurred to no purpose. Lord Rivers, the Craven Meeting conqueror of Lord Clifden, took no part in the race; East Lancashire was sent home after his terrible exhibition in the Stakes, and Caller Ou, who has been beaten three times for the Queen's Plate over this course, was never, we believe, for the Caledonian Hunt. This is the first cup that Lord Glasgow ever won during the forty years he has owned what he has been on the turf. The St. Leger settling has been very easy, and it seems that the majority of the Upper Ten, as well as the stanch Heavies all the summer, got round on to Blair Athol at the eleventh hour, in spite of the York race, which enveloped everything in such an unexpected and delicious mystery. If Scottish Prince had remained sound, it is quite on the cards that he would have started first favourite. It is stated that Mr. Hannen (who very handsomely presented the new Doncaster Infirmary with 10 gs.) did not win on the race. The added money at the meeting amounted to about £2300. About two hundred different horses started during the week, and the Grand Stand receipts nearly touched £6500. Seeing that the Corporation received only £1000 paid something like 20 per cent. We shall be surprised if they do not soon increase their private boxes and stands, for which the demand is never likely to flag. The Mayor and Mr. Foster have done yeoman service to the town by the way in which they grappled with the question, and they deserved all their success. No race committee could have been more liberal or court criticism from the heads of the racing world, and to adopt every reasonable suggestion, and it is to be hoped that the ugly personal element which has, we fear, been imported very extensively into the question, and which so seriously jeopardised the execution of the plans this summer, may soon exhaust itself.

John Osborne, with his Brown Bread and his Wild Agnes, has been carrying on his old winning game at Richmond and Gatherley, and had a pleasant little meeting, marred only by an accident to the clerk of the course, whose own bell fell on to his head while he was ringing it and cut him severely, but not seriously. Ely and Bavagah will no doubt fight their battle over again across the A. F. next week. After his long rest, and considering the form which he showed at Doncaster, Adventurer ought to be forward in one or both of the great autumn handicaps, for which we have no very belief in Caradoc, who has to talk about international contests, and it is certainly to be wished that Vermouth (who won at Chantilly last week) may make a return visit and meet Blair Athol for the next Ascot Cup, if the stanch kind gets quite right again.

The sale week at Doncaster was a most successful one. Swallow by Cotherstone (with a Trumpeter filly) headed the brood mares at 270 gs., Sister to Cotterr (230 gs.), bought by Mr. Blenkiron, coming second. Lady Clifden (750 gs.) scored the top price for mares in training, and has arrived, we hear, at the Turgill stables. The yearlings did not cause up in finer form, or fetcher prices. The five of the highest averaged 840 gs. Thirty-two of them, made 300 gs., and upwards, and nine varied from 500 gs. to 1000 gs. The latter price was made by Mr. Newton for Prince of Wales by Lambton which beat Lord Derby's Stockwell colt by 60 gs. Both these prices, however, were equalled at her Majesty's sale this year, when Mr. Merry gave 1250 gs. for a Stockwell-Bravey filly. The Miner's Great Yorkshire Handicap brought his sister Blanchland up to 1000 gs., and Rataplan was also credited with the 710-guinea Kirkconnel of the Sheffield-lane paddocks, whose Warlock, bulging from the youngsters by him, which were sold during the week, bids fair to take a high place among sires. The Lambtons also sold well, and next year there will be little curiosity among breeders to see the young Thormanbys and Kettledrums. Mr. Cookson's lot, as far as looks go, were by far the general mark; and Tactics, of whose merits such great reports, quite disappointed expectation. A very beautiful Dutchman colt bred in France would have made a very long price if he had not been wholly without engagements; and by far the most likely Wiligrove was Bachelor from Vedette's grand dam. The last lot of the week was Hubert Stockwell from Lord Zetland's stud—a very fashionably bred combination, which Sir George Strickland could not resist at 210 gs. for a crop with his Orlando. All were sold, and well sold. The money was not left at Doncaster, as the crack of Mr. Mather's lot, a colt by Touchwood out of Candlewick, made 378 gs. at Tattersall's on Monday. Stockwell, Octogre (who was very fit, but hung at the post last week), and some others of Mr. Bryan's, are to be sold at Newmarket on Thursday. Report of the thirty-four Yearlings sent of Mr. Robert Smith's breeding, which are for sale at Bristol on Thursday, are by Robby, and varying, with two exceptions, from fourteen to fifteen hands

At a meeting of the Council of the College of Preceptors, on the 19th inst., the Rev. B. H. Kennedy, D.D., of Shrewsbury, was re-elected president of the council for the ensuing year; and the Rev. J. W. Hewitt, Bromsgrove Grammar-School, Dr. W. E. Hodgson, and Mr. Joseph Payne were elected vice-presidents.

The Saint Public, of Lyons, publishes some news for archæologists. In making piles for the bridge of Port Garland, which is being thrown over the River Ain, the workmen have found a considerable amount of gilt bronze, swords, and pouches. These articles have been purchased by the conservator of the Museum. It is regretted that the museum of Roman Gallo-Roman antiquities which he is forming in the old castle of St. Germain-en-Laye, "the finest of great historical interests, as they are the memorials of the coarse pursuit by Julius Cæsar, when, having entered Brienon from Italy, he pursued Ariovistus, who was then preparing towards the Ain."

On Monday the trial-trip of the Izeddin, a yacht for the Sultan, took place at the mouth of the Medway. The vessel has just been built by the Thames Ironwork and Shipbuilding Company at Blackwall, she was designed by Mr. George Mayor, the naval architect of the company. Her dimensions are—length, 210ft.; breadth, 29ft. 6in.; depth, 18ft.; and her tonnage, 1000 tons. Her engines, manufactured by Messrs. Penn and Son, are of 300-horse power. The mean of the four runs was 16·72 knots per hour, which is equal to 19 statute miles. The vessel has 150 men to be on board. The indicated power was 3264 horse, the revolutions forty-one, and the speed of steam twenty-six pounds to the square inch pressure.

The Lahore Chronicle reports an unusual eccentricity on the part of the River Chenab, which has caused considerable damage to Dedatun, "and to other cultivated tracts in the neighborhood. For some time past embankments had been remarked and attributed to a landslip or glacier which had dammed up the river in one of the hollows of the Himalayan range, and at once it burst on Monday with fury. A correspondent from the latter city writes that on the 13th inst. the river suddenly rose 20 feet above its usual level, and in a few hours, sweeping in fresh channels on right and left hand, every direction as far as the eye can reach being a perfect sea. Communication between the city and cantonments has been completely cut off. The commissioner's house has some three or four feet of water round it. The lower portion of the suburbs of the city, including Tola Khan and Imam Pore, have been submerged, and the market-place has shared the same fate. The standing crops have all been destroyed, while villages washed down, and the panic-struck inhabitants know not whither to fly or how to escape from the deluge. Woodlands, the property of General Van Cortlandt, the favourite resort of the residents of the station, is all but a wreck. Its fine walks, its garden, containing the choicest flowers, and its orchard, stocked with the most delicious fruits, are all submerged. All around is desolation—the flood has extended for several miles, as far as the railway line; and the destruction of property caused by it must be immense."—Hyperion of Mail.

VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF WALES TO DENMARK.

We have engraved this week two sketches by our Special Artist, who has gone to Denmark for the purpose of supplying illustrations of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales. The subject of one of our Engravings is the Royal yacht Osborne proceeding up to the pier at Helsingör, with the Prince and Princess on board. The pier was already described the scene. The Osborne, with the Danish flag at her foremast, and the Prince of Wales's standard at her main, is a noble-looking vessel. She could hardly find room in Helsingör Roads or harbour to be steered to her berth at the landing-place, and she had to be warped round by the stern. This operation took up a considerable of an hour before she was placed alongside the pier. Meanwhile, the King and Queen of Denmark, with the Crown Prince and Princess Dagmar, and their suite, were rowed to the yacht in a boat, and, going on board, offered a cordial welcome to their daughter and son-in-law. The Danish flag was hoisted by the Osborne, along with the English Royal standard, while the King of Denmark was on board. At length the pier was brought close to the pier. The band playing the Danish Royal Anthem, and the marines forming a guard of honour on the quarter-deck, the King led the Princess of Wales down the crimson-covered gangway, followed by the Prince of Wales with the Queen of Denmark on his arm; then came the Danish Prince and Princess, and then the English nurse, with the Royal baby well wrapped up. The guns of the castle of Kronborg and a Royal salute, the choral societies assembled on shore sung an ode composed for the occasion to the air of "God Save the Queen," the burgomaster of Elsinore read a complimentary address, and the Royal party entered their carriages, three in all, off to Fredensborg Castle. We give a View of that building, which is distant an hour's easy ride from the town of Elsinore. It takes its name—the Castle of Peace—from the settlement putting an end to the war with Sweden, which was concluded in 1720. In the office, dating from about the period, and erected on the accession of Frederick IV., there is little externally to strike the eye. The gates and

3. Ornamental club or mace, otherwise called poramar, which is the bâton of a chief.
4. Whalebone sarec, called parasar, carried by a band round the neck.

6. Long tomahawk (kakeeree), for thrusting or cutting in a hand-to-hand fight; also used to throw.
7. Guns (pa), which are mostly percussion muskets, and many of the old Brown Bess pattern, with bayonets; but a few double-barrels also occur, which had been taken from our men.
8. A chief's spear (bothee) ornamented with the breast feathers of the brown parrot. 9. Bayonet (pandi).

swamps, and would have erected a formidable pah. The natives, after firing at our men, retired to their works, which were at once attacked by our line of battle, reinforcements having come from the camp, which was itself threatened by bodies of natives in the neighbourhood; and, the advance being sounded, the companies of the 43rd and 68th, supported by the Waikato militia, rushed into the pits in a tremendous discharge from the enemy, who fired very high, whilst our men reserved their fire till they met. The Maoris fought most desperately for a few minutes, but were soon routed, leaving the pits full of their dead. The pursuit was carried on by a small mounted force of ours. After the engagement the dead natives were lugged in their own pits, which were then filled up. A great number of prisoners were taken, and amongst them a woman, who alone remained of a number of women first seen. Every leading chief was killed.

VOLUNTEER FETE AT CONINGTON CASTLE, HUNTINGDONSHIRE.

CONINGTON CASTLE, Huntingdonshire, was originally the seat of Euchill the Dane, to whom it was given by Canute. In the Domesday Book it is stated that "Turchill held of the Abbot of Thorney, and in return supplied the monastery with strong ale." On the exile of Turchill, Coningtun was granted by William the Conqueror to Alfwold, afterwards Earl of Northumberland and Huntingdon, who married the Countess Judith, and by her imprisoned the unfortunate Earl Waltheof. Maud, who had Conington for her dowry, was married, first, to Simon de St. Liz, and, secondly, to Alfwold, son of Malcolm III., King of Scotland, who lost for his wife, Margaret, the niece of Edward the Confessor, and who thus allied the Royal families of England and Scotland. Maud, by her second husband, was the ancestress of the Earl of Huntingdon, whose daughter Isabella married Robert Bruz, Lord of Annandale, and was mother of Robert Bruce, the competitor that John Bros whose daughter and coheiress, Agnes, married Sir Patrick de Dunbar, Earl of Dunbar and March. Agnes brought Conington into the family of the Cottons, by her marriage with William, second son of Sir Richard Cotton, of Bidware, Staffordshire, whose only son and heir was the great-great-grandfather of Sir Robert Cotton, the eminent antiquary, to whom the nation is indebted for that invaluable collection of MSS. now in the British Museum, known as the Cotton Museum, under the title of "The Cottonian Library." From the extract just made from Dugdale's History of the Cottons, it will be seen that the family of the Bruces of being related to the Royal family of Scotland, and this was recognised by James I., who was accustomed to call Sir Robert Cotton, "Bruce Cotton." Sir Robert usually resided at Conington Cotton Bruce, or Bruce Cotton. At the date of Sir Robert's birth (Jan. 22, 1570) his parents were living at Denton, near Conington, as the grandfather was then alive and in residence at the castle; but when Sir Robert succeeded to the estate he rebuilt the castle, partly with the materials of Fotheringhay Castle, which was demolished at that time, and which, as the crow flies, was only nine miles distant from Conington. His relationship to Mary Queen of Scots would, doubtless, lead him to take this step in order to preserve some relics of the scene of her execution; and Gough, in his additions to Camden, says that Sir Robert brought from Fotheringhay "the whole room where Mary Queen of Scots was beheaded." By this, perhaps, is meant the deeply-recessed window, which is now placed in the entrance of the ground floor of Conington Castle; which arcade, doubtless, was on the interior walls of Fotheringhay, the window being above it, the principal window being supposed to be that which now forms the staircase window of the Talbot Inn, Oundle. The arcade is now in the garden front of the castle; but two of its divisions are shown in our Engraving on each side of the entrance-porch, which is said also to have been brought from Fotheringhay. Sir Robert Cotton partly formed his collection of antiquities at Conington, and frequently received his friend Camden within its walls. Sir Robert died at his house at Westminster, May 6, 1631, and was buried in the south chancel of Conington Church.

* See the translation of the "Huntingdonæ Domesday," by the Rev. G. Johnstone, just published.

When Sir Robert's great-grandson, Sir John Cotton, succeeded to the property, he preferred to live at the family seat at Stratton, in Bedfordshire; and, not wishing to repair Conington Castle, he took down the greater portion of it—having the stone arcade that had been brought from the banqueting-hall of Fotheringhay—and converted the remainder into a farmhouse. It was in this state when the castle and manor were purchased by Sir Gilbert Heathcote, in 1713, for £9500. Sir Gilbert was one of the Directors of the Bank of England, and was the last Lord Mayor to ride on horseback on Lord Mayor's Day. He was the Sir Gilbert Heathcote to whom Dryden is mentioned by Pope ("Imitations of Horace," Book II., Epist. ii., 240)— and appears in Bramble's "Letter" and Dyer's "Fleece." His portrait is hung in the dining-room at Conington Castle, not far from that of his grandson, Sir John Heathcote, painted at Rome by Gainsborough, and recently exhibited at the British Institution. Sir Gilbert left Conington Castle in the state as just described he found it; but his grandson, John Heathcote, Esq., M.P., restored it, in 1800, from the designs of Cockerell; and further additions were made to it in 1833 (under the direction of Mr. Blore), by the late, the present possessor, John Moyer Heathcote, Esq., who married a daughter of the late Lord Aveland.

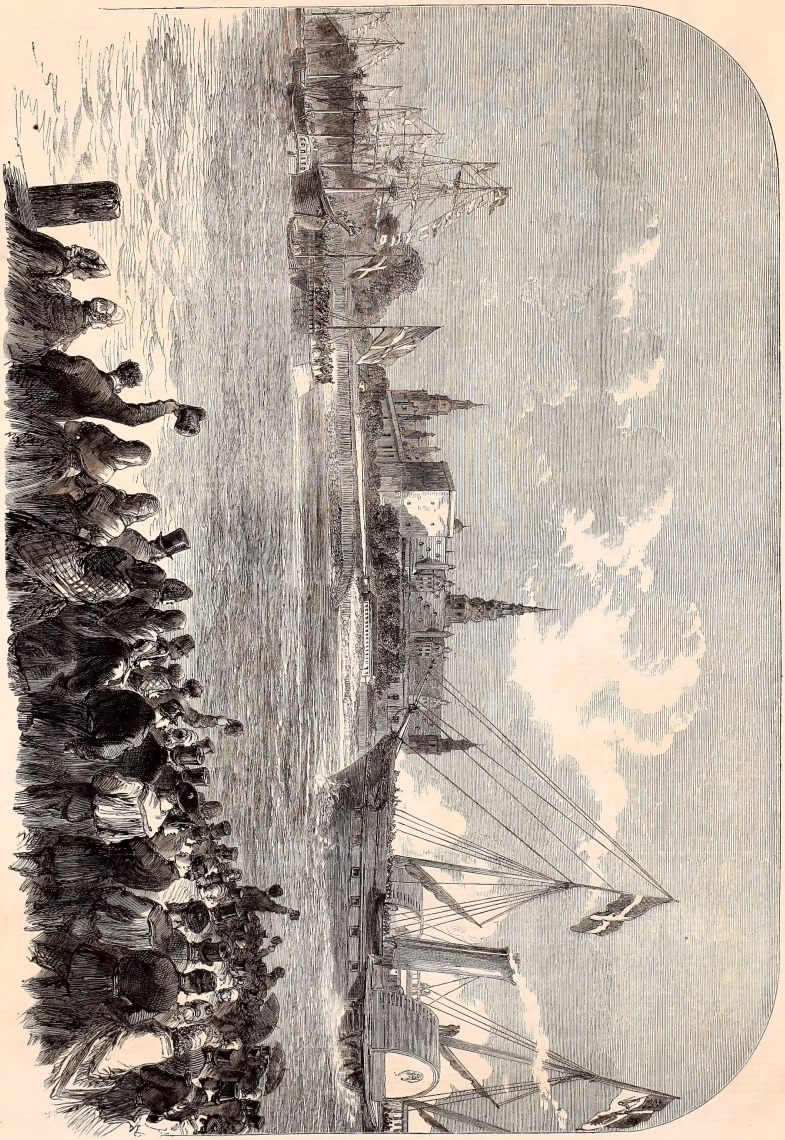
Mr. Heathcote's eldest son (who is married to a daughter of The Macleod, of Dunvegan Castle) is the leader of the Volunteer Huntingdonshire riflemen, to whom he recently gave an invitation to take the leading part in a fête in his father's park. This was carried out with great success on Tuesday, the 13th inst., and included a large concourse of spectators. After the inspection and the firing of a few-be-spoke volunteer match over to a sumptuous luncheon in a spacious tent provided for that purpose, where the good cheer was followed by the drinking of various toasts, and the delivery of suitable speeches by Mr. Heathcote, Captain Heathcote, Sir George Nugent, Mr. Fellowes, M.P., and Lieutenant Herbert. Meanwhile, a large company of invited guests were splendidly entertained within the castle; and the tenantry of the estate were not forgotten by their hospitable host. After luncheon a variety of athletic sports were engaged in, greatly to the amusement of the spectators, the winners being rewarded with handsome and valuable silver goblets and other valuable prizes. Our Engraving represents the hurdle-race, which was cleverly won by Captain Heathcote, who was the winner of the one-mile race. The day passed off without a hitch, and to most pleasures.



Our Engraving is from a sketch by Cubbitt Beet.

EARL CADOGAN.

The Right Hon. George Cadogan, Earl Cadogan, Viscount Chelsea, Baron Cadogan of Oakley, Buckinghamshire, and Baron Oakley of Caversham, Oxfordshire, Admiral of the White, a Companion of the Order of the Bath, Colonel of the Derby or Maria Theresa Regiment, and a family trustee of the British Museum, died at his residence, in Piccadilly on the 11th inst., in his eighty-second year. He was the second son of the second marquis of Charles-Sloane, third Lord Cadogan (on whom an earldom was conferred in 1800) and grandson of Charles, second Lord Cadogan, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter and coheir of Hans Sloane, Bart. COLUMN FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE magnificent Exhibition of Mediæval Art at Malines, which was announced to be closed on the 23rd inst., is, we are happy to hear, to be continued open till the 15th of October. This was gather from a letter of Mr. J. C. Robinson, of the South Kensington Museum, dated from Malines, who represents the idea of the gathering as suggested by the Loan Exhibition of 1862 at South Kensington, which the Malines display eclipses in mediæval ecclesiastical art, particularly in goldsmiths' work, although the specimens contributed "but a small sample of the treasures which, after centuries of mutilation and spoliation, still enrich the convents and churches of Belgium." Malines is one of the finest and least altered cities of the Low Countries, and is a most accessible place, with a noble cathedral, several first-rate Gothic churches, a museum of ancient pictures; and there are admirable pieces of Vandyk and Rubens, adorning the altars of churches for which they were originally painted. Mr. Robinson speaks especially of the great school of Flemish seventeenth-century wood and ivory carving, and some hundreds of ancient boxes of all sizes and styles. Such are the attractions of the picturesque old town itself. The exhibition contains bookcovers, chalices, and reliquaries of every style and type; enamelled works in brass, chasubles, including the great pastoral candelabrum, 17 ft. high, from the church of Lean; also, coming as in verse, from the diptychies and tablets of the eighth and ninth centuries down to the florid and masterly works of the school of Brabant, of the age of Rubens; the productions of the Jesquenoys of Bolderhes, and Delcourt of the seventeenth century—splendid embroidered vestments, tapestry, illuminated manuscripts, &c. Here archæologists may examine, in full light and leisure, the principal works from the famous treasury of the Sœurs de Nôtre Dame de Namur; among them should be noted the bookcover, chalice, and altar-cover of Pierre Hugo de Lignies, the chef-d'œuvre of one of the greatest artists of the thirteenth century; besides the exquisite Fifteenth-century calice of the goldsmith's guild at Ghent, the most reliquary of the Saint Chandelle of Arras, &c.

Among the historical relics of great public interest to Englishmen may be named the tunic of St. Bridget, bequeathed by Gunilda, the sister of Harold, to the Cathedral of Canterbury; two chasubles of the seventeenth century—splendid embroidered vestments, tapestry, illuminated manuscripts, &c. It is intended to repeat this exhibition triennially, should it appropriate to a question in a peculiarly good point of view. Rumours sufficient publicity has not been given to this assemblage of rare and costly works; and it is Mr. Robinson's object, by a detailed account of the exhibition, to contribute to its success—a special service to archæology for which lovers of art are bound to be grateful.

Memorials of the struggles of genius are by no means rare. One of duplicate interest has just turned up in an autograph of Tasso, recently sold at Paris, by which is that mediæval—ever! In the undersigned, acknowledge to have received from Abraham Levy 25 livres; for which sum I have pledged a sword of my father's, six shirts, and two silver cups." The document bears the date of March 17, 1570, at which time Tasso was twenty-six.

We are now all our old-time institutions. No longer is sung "Bartlemy Fair in September;" and the once-famed St. Giles's-hill, near Winchester, is fast following the example. London certainly this week was the commencement of St. Giles's Feast, Sept. 1, by the alteration of style, being the 12th. This great fair of the south of England had dwindled to one quarter-pennoth-hook, a number of rough horses; two trucks laden with apples, plums, and nuts, without even a penny pipeshow. Yet the fair was formerly one of great note, during which time not only in Winchester were the shops closed and all business suspended, but also at Southampton and all other places within twelve miles of the fair. The origin of the fair was granted by William the Conqueror to his kinsman, Walkelyn, Bishop of Winchester, probably for the support of the hospital included therein, dedicated to St. Giles, the patron of cripples. William Rufus extended the grant to three days. Henry I. to eight, Stephen to fifteen, and Edward III. to nine days. Dues were levied by the Bishop on all merchandise brought to the fair, not only from all parts of the kingdom but beyond the seas. It was also a meeting-place of the nobility and gentry, and the number of shops—probably mud walls, thatched, distinguished as the drapery, the pottery, the spicery, &c.—different streets were assigned for their different stations. The fee trade was the first to fall off, in the reign of Henry VI. Yet with the present century many booksellers was done in cheese, and a great deal brought to be the best horse fair in the county. Hops, wool, and leather were in abundance; and it long flourished as a pleasure-fair, by which people from many miles round cat roast pork for the season, which by the Hampshire folk (you a correspondent of the Times) was formerly now to consume. Six London hospitals were anciently in the suburbs of several of our old towns—as London (Cripplegate), Norwich, York, Oxford, and Wilton; and the two last have their St. Giles's to this day. Wilton's is celebrated. Oxford had its good three-day St. Giles's Fair.

We have been favoured by Mr. Thomas Jones with a communication in which he observes—"With reference to your notice in the 'Column for the Curious,' on the impression of 6-dot-9 on the oak panelling removed by me from Chequeden to Gungreg, will you permit me to state that the house built by Sir Edward Waldo, and of late 18th, 19th, 20th, and 21st inhabited Anno Domini by Barclay, one of the sons of Robert Barclay, the apologist for the Quakers, afterwards lived, and owned by Sir Isaac Lyon (1 Geo. III.) on the Lord Mayor's Days after their accession." In Mr. Jones's privately-printed "Reminiscences" the Royal visits to the Cheapside house are minutely described in the very picturesque language then including new particulars of the origin of the great banking firm of Barclay, Bevan, and Co., the latter being built into a magnificent banking-house in Lombard-street. The staff originally consisted of three clerks, and in a note to the present day the oldest clerk coming to the office for the first time, he was thus dressed —

He wore a long, flapped coat, with large pockets. The sleeves had long cuffs, with three large buttons, generally of gold, and quite worn by the Greenwich pensioners of the present day; an embroidered waistcoat, reaching nearly down to the knees, with an enormous breeches pocket on the left side, cocked hat; powdered hair, with pigtail and bagwig; and gold-headed cane, similar to those of the present day carried by footmen of high rank.

We are glad to perceive that the recent removal of the poet Milton's House, in Barbican, has served to interest other minds in the restoration of Cripplegate Church, which was commenced in 1862, as a national memorial to the great epic bard, whose remains rest here. He lived in the parish—first Aldersgate; subsequently in Jewin-street; and finally in Artillery-walk, on the Middlesex side of Cripplegate, where he died. He was buried in the chancel of the old church, which, says the hon. secretary to the Memorial Fund, is all that remains of the local past of Milton; everything that he knew is changed but the church. The restoration, begun by public subscription, have already placed the bust of the poet in a monumental shrine in the south wall; restored the chancel-roof, columns and several windows; by aid of a second subscription, the work has been resumed; the restoration of the church in all the features of its original stateliness, is a matter of national moment to Milton—indeed, as a shrine for his remains—is a fit object of national sympathy. Did we possess in this country any fund for the preservation of memorials of the great men, that of Cripplegate would have a prime claim through "the religious solemnity of Milton's own temperament."

The restoration of Chichester Cathedral has nearly reached the completion of the tower, which is described as very beautiful. When it has been completed the scaffolding will be removed; and when the builders are ready to commence the spire, an entirely new set of scaffolding will be raised, starting from the summit of the tower. Some unreasonable impatience upon this point has been shown; for to complete the work £12,000 or £14,000 more are wanted. The spire could not have been erected until the tower had been built. The county of Sussex has not lost its interest in the rebuilding of its noblest architectural ornament; and it is hoped that in two or three years the good work will be complete.

AGRICULTURAL EXHIBITION AT ROORKEE, NORTH-WEST PROVINCES OF INDIA.

PRIZE FIELD-BULLOCKS.

AGRICULTURAL EXHIBITION AT ROORKEE.

In the Number of this Journal for July 2 we gave some Illustrations of the cattle show held about the beginning of this year in the Belvedere Grounds, Calcutta, under the auspices of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. The photographs of the prize animals, from which our Engravings were made on that occasion, were taken, at the Governor's request, by an amateur photographer, Mr. W. L. Nowere, times appointed Assistant Commissioner of Forests in Central India. We have now received a set of photographs, taken by Mr. James Freeman, of the Agricultural Exhibition which took place at Roorkee, in the North-western provinces, at the beginning of April. Our Engravings comprise a view of the entrance to the showyard from the high road outside, with representations of a pair of prize bullocks and of a wild ass, which attracted much notice in the exhibition. There were some beautiful horses from every district of Upper India, various species of oxen and cows, a two-humped camel, some elks, and even a tiger cat, which could hardly be reckoned among the domestic animals. The show of sheep and poultry was not very good. In the department of machinery there were chaff-cutting machines, seed-crushers, and cotton-gins, a large hydraulic cotton-press, and several machines for raising water. Exed beside the canal adjoining the showyard. As Roorkee is situated on the road to the great fair of Hurdwar, frequented by many thousands of the Hindoos at that season, the number of visitors to the exhibition was very great.

THE CARNARVON AND LLANBERIS RAILWAY.

THE picturesque vale of Llanberis, with the neighbouring hamlet of Dolbadarn, about nine miles from Carnarvon, is well known as the head-quarters of tourists in the Snowdon mountain district. On Thursday week a commencement was made of the proposed Carnarvon and Llanberis Railway, which will not only afford great accommodation to that class of travellers, but will be of the greatest importance in the carriage of the mineral traffic of the district, consisting of slates, ironstone, sulphur, and copper. The carriage of these products to Carnarvon, for shipment, has hitherto cost from 4s. to 9s. per ton, but when the railway is completed the cost will be limited to from 1s. to 1s. 6d. per ton. The district, although a mineral one, is not coal-producing, and all the coals consumed are obtained from Carnarvon, and carted there at a cost of little less than 7s. 6d. per ton. The railway when completed will convey coals to the principal works in the district at a cost of about 1s. per ton; and general merchandise, which costs now about 7s. 6d. per ton, will, on the completion of the line, be carried to and from the district at a cost of about 1s. 6d. per ton. The gradients of the line will be easy, and it is expected it will be opened for traffic in the July of 1866. Along a great portion of the line of its route, some dozen or fifteen years ago, there were very few houses, but within the last twelve months 106 houses have been built in the district of Llanberis alone—a strong proof of the necessity for additional accommodation in the neighbourhood. The line was projected by Mr. Rolfe, a local engineer, and successfully carried through Parliament in the last Session. The contract has been let to Messrs. Dalrymple and Findlay, and the works are now commenced. Since much interest was taken throughout Carnarvonshire in the ceremony of "cutting the first sod," three or four thousand people assembled under the shadow of Snowdon to witness the proceedings. The ground was kept clear by the 1st Carnarvon (Artillery) and 3rd Carnarvon Volunteer Corps, whose bands of music were in attendance. The children of the village schools were marched in procession to the ground. The Hon. F. Wynn, with Miss Emily Wynn and other members of the family of Lord Newborough, accompanied by Mr. Thomas Turner, the chairman, and other directors of the company, and many of the local gentry, were present. After a prayer from the Rev. Mr. Williams, the Vicar of Llanberis, and a brief explanatory speech from Mr. Turner, the lady we have named, the Hon. Emily Wynn, performed the office of first "navvy" with admirable tact and elegance. An enthusiastic cheer greeted the discharge of the first sod from the elegant barrow she wheeled to the end of the platform, and this was followed by a salvo from some 18-pounder guns which the Carnarvon Artillery had brought upon the ground. Their heavy booming shook the earth, and was responded to by the echoes along the whole mountain range till the sounds died away in the distance. The effect was inconceivably grand, the crowd cheered, and so the proceedings were brought to a close. Shortly after, a select company assembled at the Victoria Hotel, Llanberis, on the invitation of the chairman and directors, to partake of luncheon in celebration of this event.

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

BEFORE the British Association for the Advancement of Science had completed its annual business at Bath, the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science inaugurated its eighth session at York. We summarily noticed the proceedings of the former, we can do no less with those of the latter.

Once more Lord Brougham, in deference to the earnest importunities of his Yorkshire friends, consented to fill the presidential chair; and once more his inaugural address has compelled his admiring fellow-countrymen to contrast the vigour and versatility of his intellectual powers with the weight of years which has done so little to benumb them. Comparisons are generally odious, because invidious; but it is impossible to refrain altogether from looking at Lord Brougham's address side by side with that of Sir Charles Lyell; and, in this instance, happily, there is no occasion to detract from the merits of the one in order to enhance the brilliancy of the other. Each was a rare exemplification of a particular style and method of inaugural discourse. The object of both was the same—the manner essentially different. Sir C. Lyell opened the proceedings of the British Association with a compact, lucid, logical, suggestive survey of facts and inferences lying within that department of science of which he is acknowledged as facile princeps. Lord Brougham, on the contrary, ranged over the entire region comprised within the boundaries of social science, marked the progress which had been achieved in its several sections, and indicated the direction which investigation might take in each with fairest promise of practical results. The one was concise and exact, the other discursive. The former, having to deal with the operations of Nature, found no room for the indulgence of sentiment; the other, concerned only with the various relations of Man, availed himself of fitting opportunity for giving occasional and graceful expression to his emotions. Both aimed at concentrating the attention of those whom they addressed to the duties which lay before them, and at stimulating their faculties to the highest strain of exertion; but each compassed, by an opposite method, the end he had in view. Sir Charles Lyell's speech resembled the signal-gun; Lord Brougham's, the ascent of a bundle of rockets; and the sonorous, clear, well-defined boom of the one not less, but not better, answered his purpose than the upward flight and brilliant coruscations of the other. "The audience, it will be safe to assume, were dismissed to their special work intellectually braced up for the more efficient discharge of their duties.

The noble and venerable president, when responding to the toast drunk in his honour at the banquet, undertook to vindicate the object of the association as entitled to be regarded in the strictest sense as a science. The social relations of man, he maintained, were as much a matter of scientific investigation as his moral relations or his physical faculties. Men talked of a moral philosophy or science, and why not also of a social? He asserted that not only was there such a thing as social science, but that it was the most important science of all. Without feeling ourselves compelled to acknowledge the supremacy in importance of social science over all others—an assertion pardonable enough from the lips of "one filling the post of president of the association—we see no reason for assuming, as some have done, that the facts which concern man's social relations are not as capable of generalisation into what, for want of a better term, we call "laws" as any other class of facts. The same Infinite Mind to whose wisdom we refer the arrangement of the physical universe impressed also his will upon the nature of man; and, although it may not be so easy to ascertain it in the latter as in the former case, it certainly is preposterous to take for granted that it is utterly incapable of being ascertained. It must be admitted, nevertheless, that, in dealing with the various and extremely complex relations in which men stand towards one another and to the laws and duties which arise out of them, there is no little danger lest conclusions which have been gathered from a narrow induction of facts, and speculations resting upon hasty assumptions taken up upon necessary knowledge, should be dignified with the name of science, and should thereby gain a currency to which they are by no means entitled. It is the proper business of the National Association, and will be an indispensable condition of its continuance and growth, to exercise the utmost care in this matter, and rather to pride itself upon slowly adding to the few grains of solid truth it has collected than to make a large show of results which will not abide the most searching ordeal of scientific investigation. We suspect that it has been in respect of the crude theories, the narrow dogmas, and the self-confident assertions which have been thrown down before the association by impatient and half-cultivated explorers, that the contempt of which Lord Brougham complained has hitherto been cherished, and perhaps somewhat too broadly expressed; and assuredly the members of the association cannot better preserve its true interests, nor more appropriately consult its dignity, than by imitating the successful masters of physical science in their industry in the collection of facts, their caution and conscientious discrimination in classifying them, and their cheerful promptitude in announcing the wholesome inferences when they are found to be at variance with known and well-established results. Festina lente should be their motto, for in this more than in any other department of philosophical study it is quite possible to "make more haste than good speed."

If we had been asked to point out a model for the study and imitation of those who have given themselves to the pursuit of social science, we should content ourselves with referring to Sir James Wilde. The learned Judge of the Probate and Divorce Court opened the proceedings of the Jurisprudence Department with a discourse on law reform. Nothing could have been more profound or philosophical than his treatment of this vast and multifarious subject, nothing more crisp, terse, or exquisitely eclectic than the language into which he put his thoughts. The fruit of much experience, of many long years of assiduous observation, and of close and repeated reflection, is presented by Sir James in a few clusters of rare significance, wonderfully pleasant to the taste and refreshing to the mind choked with the dust of dry, legal details—wonderfully easy we may add, of digestion. In counselling the friends of law reform to the boldness necessary to grapple with the evils he has thrown such light upon, he laid bare his own spirit. "I speak not," he said, "of that boldness which is assumed to challenge the admiration of the multitude and play the part of superior wisdom in the eyes of the ignorant by sweeping denunciations of that to which others bow; nor of that audacity which is the spurious offspring of veneration, daring under the reverence of others, and casting off its cover in a spirit of defiance; nor of that begotten of idleness and shallowness, which feels the wrongs of a system whose true defects it takes not the pains to discover, and flies out into a general condemnation. But I mean that boldness which is born of the firm conviction that whatever is contrary to common-sense and natural justice ought also to be contrary to law; the boldness that fears not to depart from the past to render honour to the present; which acknowledges that the law is made for man, and not man for the law; and which marches straight to its object, preferring simplicity with some defects to the perfection at which complexity aims but rarely reaches."

This is a beautiful expression of the genuine scientific spirit. Applied only by the learned Judge to the subject of law reform, it is equally applicable, with but a slight change of terms, to every department of Social Science. The besetting temptation of those who devote themselves to this study is to make haste to generalise, and to be content with imperfect means for achieving results admittedly desirable. They are very apt to lose sight of the fact that in social matters the cure of an evil is often of less importance than the process by which the cure is effected. They do not fully estimate the necessity of consulting the public mind with reference to the choice of the human will; and too often in seeking to coerce it they evoke its most strenuous opposition. Hence, an injudicious, because a really unscientific, method of dealing with social mischief too frequently begets more than it is able to destroy; and, while it succeeds in effecting a partial reform, it leaves that which otherwise would have remained latent. Too much vigilance can hardly be exercised by the leading members of the association in checking the too prevailing disposition to yield to this temptation, nor too earnest a care displayed in submitting for a spirit of empiricism that of sober and sound philosophy.

Undoubtedly, the National Association, during its comparatively short term of existence, has exhibited a most gratifying tendency to work itself clear of liability to reproach in this respect. In recent meetings at York and Bath it has done so. In all the sections some addition has been made to our common stock of knowledge, whilst in most those most inviting to theorists growing caution has been evinced. The sincere friends of the association, amongst whom we desire to be classed, may well congratulate themselves on the fact—on this fact, and on the feelings, for it is that which, above all others, augurs for it a grand career of service. Its field of usefulness is all but unlimited, and, to a considerable extent, is an unknown region. No zeal in exploring it, no industry in cultivating it, no study in mastering the difficulties which lie within its precincts will be assigned, will be without its adequate remuneration. May the labours of the association become every year more and more worthy of its object, for the measure of its success will be the measure of increased happiness to the family of man!

DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES BY LORD PALMERSTON AND LADY HERBERT TO THE WILTS RIFLE VOLUNTEERS.

The fourth annual meeting of the Wilts Rifle Association was held on the 23rd ult. at Wilton House, by the kind permission of the Earl of Pembroke, to the most successful marksmen. This ceremony took place in the Wilton House, by permission of Lady Herbert of Lea, in the absence of the late Secretary of State for the War Department. Her Ladyship on this occasion gave an entertainment to about 600 guests, and Lord Palmerston and Lady Palmerston and Lord Shaftesbury, the Marquis of Bath, Earl Nelson, Lord Arundel, Earl Grosvenor; Lord Ernest Bruce, M.P.; Earl of Pembroke, Earl of Radnor, Lord Fitzhardinge, Lord Bathurst, M.P.; Mr. Bouverie, M.P., Mr. Antrobus, M.P.; Mr. Sotheron Estcourt, Mr. Benyon de Beauvoir, M.P., and Lady Heytesbury, General Buckley, the Marquis and Marchioness of Worcester, Count Strzelecki, and the principal gentry of Wiltshire, were present. Upon the arrival of Lord Palmerston in front of the house, while the several volunteer corps were drawn up in review order, the band played "God save the Queen," and was followed by the Earl of Carnarvon, whom Lady Herbert had requested, as the nearest relative of the family, to speak on her behalf. His Lordship, after briefly referring to the rise and progress of the volunteer movement and bearing testimony to the public spirit and efficiency of the Wilts Volunteer Rifle Corps, called upon the hon. viscount Mr. H. Kelsey, to read out the list of the winners of prizes. This having been done, each of the successful competitors came forward as his name was called, and received his prize from the hands of Lady Herbert with the exception of Sergeant Jeffries, of the 6th Wilts, the winner of the chief prize. This was a challenge cup, to be held for three years, with the addition of a silver vase, given by the Mayor and Corporation of Salisbury. The latter Sergeant Jeffries had won the first year, and carried this cup, as shown in the Engraving on our front page. The noble Lord, who was very cordially cheered, then addressed the assembled volunteers. He hoped that the establishment of the volunteer system in England, he said in a noble Lord's opinion, would increase the patriotism, and persevering courage was never made in any country. As we lived in an island, and as by any treaties who might venture to land on our shores, we could not defend ourselves, as some continental States might do, by nicely fortifying one or two vulnerable points or frontiers, it was therefore so as to guard a single point of attack. But we had done that which was within our means, and which would be sufficient for our purpose. We had begun and carried out to a great extent the works necessary to protect from sudden attack those naval dockyards and arsenals which were the cradles of our maritime power and the chief bulwarks of the land—namely the coasts, and the heart of the command of the seas which surround our shores, and a hostile squadron were to make a descent upon our coasts, our commerce, our industry, and our independence would be seriously endangered. That work was begun by the late noble occupant of these mansions, Lord Herbert, who had devoted his best energies to those operations. His plans had been followed out, and would soon be successfully completed. Although the Earl of Pembroke, who had been a distinguished volunteer officer in the field, it was not our habit—it do not put our Constitution or our institutions to the test—to be continually under arms ourselves to the thousands of men, as in other countries of Europe. We had, therefore, to establish a reliable force, upon which we could look in the hour of regular away; but we must chiefly rely upon the volunteers, who had come forward to supply the deficiency in a manner which entitled them to the warmest thanks of the country. He (Lord Carnarvon) was from 150,000 to 160,000 volunteers, armed, equipped, trained, and disciplined, with officers who had made themselves well acquainted with their duties, so that on some occasions, when those corps had been called out, they performed their duties in the most satisfactory manner, which do not belong simply to battalions, but also to divisional operations, they had excited the admiration of military men and the astonishment of strangers. Lord Palmerston went on to say—"You know, gentlemen volunteers of England, you well know that numbers alone do not constitute strength—that large assemblies of men, although in uniform and with the best of weapons, are not by their number alone competent to meet with success an enemy disciplined and trained; and therefore at a great sacrifice of private occupation, at a great sacrifice of time, which in this country is money, you have become thoroughly acquainted with the duties of your honourable profession. You have, by your perseverance and constant attention to your duties, made yourselves masters of all those movements which belong to separate battalions, and also to collections of battalions in brigades and divisions. You have also well thought that it is one thing to meet and another to kill an enemy. But you, who have so well exhibited their skill to-day and yesterday, will not neglect a practice almost as necessary as your drill, and even your battalion and divisional exercises. The people of this island have at all times been famous as marksmen; and in the days of old, when war was carried on, I will not say with less deadly, but with more clumsy, weapons, such as bows and arrows, the British archer was celebrated in every battle-field of Europe in which he was engaged, and his skill was derived from the slaughter which he made of his opponents. Well, gentlemen, the long bow, the cloth-yard arm, which so distinguished your ancestors, are not wanting to you, and this day you have given ample proof of your skill in the weapon which is placed in your hands. You have proved yourselves worthy descendants of your ancestors—equally ready to defend your shores from attack, and, if need be, to vindicate the honour of your country." He ended by congratulating them on having received their prizes from the lady of the house.

On the motion of the Marquis of Bath, three cheers were given for Lord and Lady Palmerston, Lady Herbert, and the young Earl of Pembroke, and the proceedings were brought to a close.

ITALY.

A Turin despatch states that in all parts of Italy the news of the conclusion of a convention with the French Government respecting Rome has been received with the greatest satisfaction. One consequence of the convention seems to have been a change of Ministry; for King Victor Emmanuel has charged General Marmora with the task of forming a new Administration.

Tranquillity was completely restored yesterday week in Turin; but on the previous evening there were renewed disturbances. Troops assembled, uttered "seditious cries," threw stones, and fired shots in front of the King's palace; and ultimately the troops were compelled to fire on the mob, when some twenty persons were killed or wounded, while several soldiers were severely wounded.

A Royal decree has been published ordering the meeting of Parliament until the 24th inst., as the day originally fixed did not allow a sufficient time for the formation of a Cabinet.

DENMARK AND GERMANY.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, after being the centre of great festivities in Copenhagen—where, notwithstanding anticipations to the contrary, they have been most cordially welcomed—left the city last Saturday for Stockholm, amidst salutes from the batteries and the acclamations of the people.

It seems to be settled that the Princess's sister, Princess Dagmar, is to be betrothed to the Czarevitch, who is again in Copenhagen.

Earl Clarendon is on a mission at Vienna, in which object, it is said, of forwarding the peace negotiations between Denmark and Germany, and also for the purpose of laying before the Austrian Government the views of England on the Franco-Italian convention. His Lordship is said to have told Count Rechberg that should Austria form a Northern alliance to oppose the convention England would not co-operate with her. The Neue Freie Presse of Vienna is the authority for these statements.

AMERICA.

We have telegraphic news from New York, by way of Cape Race, to the 20th ult.

General Sheridan has defeated General Early, with heavy loss, in the Shenandoah Valley. At an early hour on the morning of the 18th ult. the Federals attacked the Confederates, and there ensued a furious battle, which lasted the whole day. The result was that General Early was defeated, and was compelled to retreat up the Shenandoah Valley, with the loss of from 2,000 prisoners, and 5000 men killed or wounded, including Generals Gordon and Shaller. The victorious Federals, whose loss was heavy and one of whose Generals was killed, then advanced to Fisher's Hill.

On the 16th ult. General Grant arrived at Washington, for the purpose, it may be supposed, of calling up the Governors for fresh reinforcements, as Secretary Stanton had since ordered the draught to take place on the 19th in all the States which had not furnished their quota. Mr. Seward's assertion at Auburn that no draught would be required was therefore incorrect.

General Sherman has determined to make Atlanta an exclusively military post. He therefore ordered all citizens to leave the place within ten days, and gave them the option to be provided for beyond Rood, while protesting against the order, agreed to a truce for ten days to carry it out. To this Hood refused to go. He writes, "that the unprecedented measure you propose transcends in studied and ingenious cruelty all the acts ever brought to my attention in this dark history of war. In the name of God and humanity, I protest against it, believing that you are expelling from their homes the wives and children of a brave people." The Southern papers express their indignation in no measured terms. The Richmond Sentinel speaks of the order as "an event unparalleled in the American war." After calling Sherman "the chief among savages, the captain among pirates, the leader among highwaymen, the prince among scumbags and looters, and the foremost villain of the world, the editor calls upon the people, if any are left, to come out and make the war, "horrible as it has been, still more so." He says, "No matter about age now. The last man and the last boy must take his musket sooner than endure such outrages as that at Atlanta."

The improvement would be greatly facilitated by the alternations consequent on the works going on here for the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway. The advantage of such a circus greatly commended itself to the commission, and it was referred to the improvements committee.

Last week the births of 1953 children—975 boys and 978 girls—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1854-63 the average births of those weeks was 1,881—so that this ended last Saturday the deaths of 1229 persons, of whom 623 were males and 606 females, were registered in the metropolis. If the 1,881 average births in the thirty-eight weeks of 1854 are excluded, the average number of deaths in the corresponding weeks of the nine years 1854-63, calculated on the mean of population, was 1181. From zymotic diseases in the aggregate the deaths last week were 344, in the previous week 350, and in the week before 340. Diarrhœa fell in seventy-eight cases. Three children died from cholera. Ten deaths were caused by typhus, nineteen by typhoid, and 9 by scarlet fever. Measles caused seventy-two deaths. Twelve deaths occurred from diphtheria. A substantial dividend amounting to upwards of £110,000 is appended.

Mutley was on Monday brought before the Coroner's jury and the police magistrates at Bow-street. The evidence given before both tribunals was little more than a repetition of that which appeared in our last. He was committed by the magistrate on the charge of murder; and the Coroner's jury after returning a verdict of wilful murder against him, at the same time they censured the existing mode of railway travelling in one in which an efficient guard was afforded to the safety of passengers.

Edward Russell Daunt, a stockjobber, of Hercules-court, Threadneedle-street, closed yesterday at the Mansion House Sessions, before Alderman Colonel Sibaugh, a retired Indian officer, of about £5000, and also with fraud to a less amount, on a gentleman named Thomas. Daunt was charged with the commercial language "an outsider," that is, not a member of the Stock Exchange, and who had been accustomed to advertise for business, a practice which no member of the Stock Exchange is allowed to adopt.

From Bow-street has been committed for trial a man calling himself Augustine William Beauclerk Rattler, charged with obtaining money by false pretences representing himself to be a clergyman of the Church of certain imaginary institutions, called the "St. James's College," the "Jeremiah Society," and the "Calvary Mission," which have no existence. Amongst the dupes who gave evidence at his examination was the following:—Peter Limmer Hargreaves, 11, Bentinck-terrace, Regent's-park, said that in the past he prisoner called on him representing himself as a clergyman of the Church of England. Read at the time from the Rose London Almanack, he said that he was "one of the Bishop of London's men." He then ordered a seat "to be reserved for other distinguished persons who were expected," and went to take off and thrust aside when going to see the Bishop." Witness supplied him with the money required, and he now had not. He (the witness) for it on the following Thursday. To another he represented himself as the secretary of the Bishop of Lavinia, and obtained money from another. The shopkeeper takes them, and, on looking at the ends of the tops, finds the pencils different, and of inferior sort. A heavy fine was imposed on the customer for whom they are bought. The practice of selling pencils made in accordance with this trick long formed the subject of complaints by the Westminster Police Court, yesterday week, a man was brought up charged with having in his possession 12 pencils, secreted in the lapel of his coat in a sidelong slide, and towed her into Milford Haven. The crew were quite exhausted, and knew not a pair of wind blowing at the time.

The choirs present upon this occasion was 1400, and they came from Shrewsbury, Derby, Nottingham, Leamington, Coventry, Birmingham, Newcastle, Stafford, Leek, and many other towns in this extensive diocese.

A number of the Indies of Canterbury recently got up a subscription to defray the cost of placing a figure of the Dean of Canterbury in one of the new niches of the cathedral, as a tribute of the esteem entertained for the Dean, by the ladies. An handsome effigy of the reverend gentleman, by Dean Alford, is declined the proffered compliment, and suggested that the figure of Edward the Black Prince should be substituted, which suggestion, the Kent Herald states, will be carried out.

The new church at Bickley was opened on the 18th ult., by licence from the Archbishop of Canterbury, and will be consecrated when unencumbered with a debt of £1,000. The church is in the Early English style, the architect being the Bodleian Summit will seat about 1000 persons, and there is every accommodation for free seats for the poor. Bishop of Lincoln held a confirmation in the Parish Church, which has been built in St. Alvar's-road, in a district where such an edifice will fill its neighbourhood with a congregation. These churches (named, with that of All Saints, founded by Mr. Whitby, which is to be consecrated on the 1st of November) are the Vicarages of the Rev. Arthur Denison and the thirteen. Since the appointment of Mr. Brooks to the vicarage of St. Mary's (a period of nearly twenty years) he has been instrumental in building five new churches in Nottingham.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1864.

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR has not been permitted to see his favourite Florence become the capital of Italy. In his nineteenth year the veteran author has gone to his rest. The death of such a man is too remarkable an incident in the history of a year to be left to the ordinary necrological record, and we are not without hope that some of the stronger pens of the age will do justice to his memory. We wish we were more certain that much will not be written upon the subject by those who are inadequately acquainted with his history and with the services which he has done to literature, as well as to the political interests of his country. For his works are by no means every man's reading, especially in the days when coarse food, provided it be highly spiced, is more acceptable than the true epicurean banquet. And a generation has passed since party politics overpowered conviction. The books which Landor leaves will be his enduring monument; but they must be studied, and these are not times when the majority of men have much care for study. "Who runs may read" is now held a motto implying the highest praise for the commended work; and, now that every one runs, the literature of the day must be prepared in conformity with the spirit of that laudation. Such is not the literature to which Walter Savage Landor devoted his long life.

Perhaps, a word for his politics may not serve him ill with those who will bestow but scant pains upon his extraordinary writings. Ninety years take us back far into the last century. But, after taking into account some five-and-twenty years, and thus bringing Landor to the age of real manhood, we shall find that his active days began at a time when not only was "advanced Liberalism" an unfashionable thing, but a thing involving suspicion, disfavour, and even danger. We are bound to make all allowance for the position of those who wielded the destinies of England at a period when she had to make head against Revolutionism, and against a score of revolutions welded into a thunderbolt by the hand of the greatest soldier of modern days, and it were cowardly to seek to find blots on the shield which was thrown between ourselves and foreign tyranny. But, as a matter of fact, Government was then composed of men who were not, and its parasites rejoiced in tormenting men who were supposed to be able to discriminate between revolutionary principles and revolutionary excesses. The Court had great power during the early part of the century; and while Royalty led two factions, and served itself through both, there was little favour for those who belonged to neither. The fatal word "Radical" had an odiousness of meaning which it would be difficult to understand in days when men no more think of coupling social position with more than the ghost of quarrelling with their neighbour at dinner for preferring still to effervescent champagne. But in the time when Landor attained manhood, and for years later, it was a very hard thing indeed for society to believe a man a gentleman who believed in Radical principles; and Landor, well born, proud, and in the world, suffered proportionately for his heresies. That vulgar, noisy men, who wore white hats and shouted to mobs in Copenhagen-fields or to popular assemblies at the Crown and Anchor, should be Radicals was natural; but that the born aristocrat, the learned scholar, the classic writer, should throw in his lot with "advanced Liberalism" was in those times a brave thing, which will not be comprehended now. Let justice be done him, however, in this particular, and let those who will not read his writings for their unequivocal and artistic merits read the "Conversations" and note the proofs they afford that from the earliest part of his life true Liberalism found a true friend in Landor. He struck no feeble blows; he never tickled with the feather end of his pen when he should have stabbed with its point. Tyranny, baseness, arrogance, cruelty, in kings, priests, politicians, or mobs, alike received his energetic thrust; and it left, not seldom, a poison in the wound. There was a deadly sarcasm, of which Landor was a strangely skilful master, and which may even yet be noted with admiration for its epigrammatic power, though the edge with which it was inspired has long been dust. Landor's sword was very heavy, very bright, and very keen.

But posterity, for whom the political battles have been fought and won, soon forgets its champions, unless they have something else than their services to keep memory green. Walter Savage Landor has taken noble pains to provide against the ingratitude of men. In two large closely-printed volumes, into which form, and, happily, with his own corrections, the mass of his writings were brought together a few years ago, he has erected for himself not a cairn, but a column that will survive most of the memorials reared in the present age. To those who are acquainted with Landor's writings it will seem worse than an impertinence to say these things; but we regret to be compelled to think that even such a noble literature of the past generation is but slightly studied by this, and we were confirmed in this belief by reading with disgust the ignorant and insolent comments made upon him by the half-educated writers at the time when an unhappy affair had rendered unfavourable a great name formerly before society. Creatures who could not have read a page of "Pericles and Aspasia" without spelling at the words, and could have comprehended that page under no conditions whatever, were allowed to pen offhand condemnations of a man whose shoes they could never have honourably filled. To that miserable incident, chiefly the result of an old man being left without the affectionate care of relatives at an age when the mind was no longer in vigour, we should be ashamed to allude, but that as it is nearly all that will dwell in the intellects of many who will this week and later of the Author, we shall not be surprised to see it treated as the leading event of a life of ninety years. Enough that one of the grandest writers of England has died in peace, at eighty-four, there was no one to watch over a pen that had held its own against the world for half a century with honour.

A great man has gone, and his greatness has not yet been revealed in full measure, except to the educated. We venture to hope that, not for Landor's sake, but for that of the age, some one of those who are competent to the task will one day set him forth to the world as he truly was, and in some popular way make it known how great a man has passed from among us. When the magnificent storehouse of thought which he has left as a legacy shall be an habitual resort, and when his marvellous skill in the adroit conveyance of thought should be generally recognized, we shall not cease to have big writers as we have done, though, were due homage paid in England to her really great men, it would have been worse than needless to tell Englishmen that "another has gone to dwell among the mighty dead."

The British Government has given £500 to the sister of the late Dr. Edward Vogel, who lost his life in Central Africa whilst travelling for the Foreign Office, giving all services gratuitously.

Sir Roderick Murchison writes to the Times that his geographical friends and himself intend to make a liberal contribution of a suitable monument to commemorate the exploits of Captain Speke, the man who, out of all Europeans, has penetrated equatorial Africa from south to north, with his companion Grant, and who (setting aside all disputes regarding the source of the Nile) has conclusively determined the existence and position of the great water basin whence the Nile flows. Subscriptions to "the Speke Memorial Fund" will be received by Messrs. Coutts and Co., and Messrs. Cocks and Biddulph, bankers; and at the office of the Royal Geographical Society, 15, Whitehall-place.

The treasurers of the "Art Exhibition for the Relief of the Distress in the Cotton Districts" have issued a balance sheet, showing the receipts and expenses in connection therewith, from which it appears that £2500 was realized and paid over to the objects of the exhibition. The amount received for pictures, drawings, objects of art, fruit, vegetables, catalogues and subscriptions at the door, was £2098. The disbursements were £303, given to the Relief Committee Fund; three sums of £50 each, and one of £44, to the Central Relief Fund; and a sum of £100 to the Warehousemen and Clerks' Association, Manchester.

The Royal party stayed until the end of the performance, when a voice cried out, in Danish, "Long live the Prince and Princess of Wales," which was followed by the same enthusiastic cheering from all parts of the house—the orchestra swelling the outburst with a pas de charge. THE FRIENDS AND PRINCESS OF WALES IN DENMARK.

With this week present four Illustrations by our Special Artist of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Denmark. Our first engraving represents the arrival at the gate of the Castle of Bernstorf, to which they removed from Fredensborg on Wednesday, the 14th ult. The rural district in which Bernstorf is situated appears to be very fertile. The surrounding country is in a high state of agricultural cultivation, studded with villas prettily surrounded by blooming flower-gardens, and the fields were yet bare of corn, except in the small forests of the richest foliage. Bernstorf itself—which was the favorite residence of Prince Christian before he became King—is neither large nor fine, but has a good-sized country house, and extensive accommodation for the family of a private gentleman. The entrance-gate is by a wide opening between two lofty stone piers. Each access is gained to a suite of apartments plainly but elegantly furnished, and the ceilings are decorated with a series of paintings, which, in the slope of the roof, are the servants' quarters. The frontage of the house is perfectly white and plain, except over the entrance-door, where, in the centre of the pediment, is a shield, with a tablet, exhibiting in gilt letters the following inscription :—

At each side the house is flanked by plantations which shut it in from the outer world. Behind the mansion there is a wide access to walks beautifully arranged, from which, as well as from the upper windows, are charming views of the surrounding country—the meadows, fields of corn and wood, and on the other to the Sound and the city of Helsingor. Close by the beautiful retreat Princess Alexandra passed most of her earlier years.

No very sumptuous preparations had been made at Bernstorf for the reception of the Prince and Princess, supposed to be a visit as much as possible to avoid display. A triumphal arch was erected immediately over the entrance-gate, but the decorations were of fir cone-leaves and forest flowers and berries were combined with the produce of private gardens. The English and Danish flags floated from the summit, and the leaves of the triumphal arch were also wreathed from each front. The side presenting itself to view on approaching the castle bore the following words :—

A. E. and A.
Velkommen til Bernstorf i Nordsjælland mieder glæde den kjærlige
Hustru og Moder—

a little effusion of Danish gallantry, in which the place connected with all the early associations of the Princess was made to express its delight at welcoming her return in the twofold character of happy wife and mother. The inscription thus reads in English :—

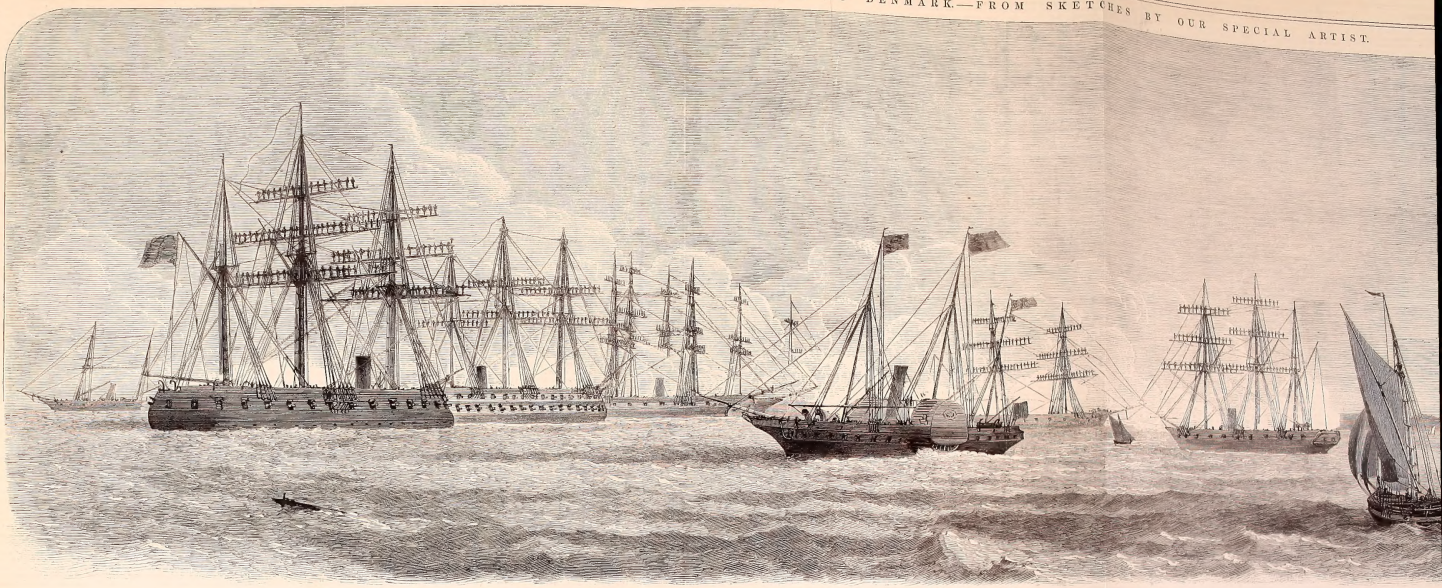
God velsigne det Hus Gjængar og Deres Huus—viz., God bless the Dwellers about and their noble abode.

For more than a mile from the gates of the castle the road was lined with a well-dressed crowd, while vehicles of every kind, from carriages and pairs to the humblest of delizzias, filled with the living rows of seats, were packed away in an avenue by themselves. A few of the principal officers of police, in costume resembling the military uniform, moved about to keep the line; a host of cavalry officers stood just outside the gates of the castle, and the waving plumes towering above the level of the bonnets; but, with these exceptions, the gathering was quite one of the people. On one side of the triumphal arch was an instrumental band; on the other side was the choir of Gjentofte, headed by its Dean. This revered gentleman, by name M. Boisen, was the quaint costume of the Lutheran Church—the plain black gown and ruff, with the decoration of the Order of the Danneborg. General D'Oxholm and an officer of the Royal household drove up to the castle in the first carriage, and the Royal equipage with its four horses was about to follow, when the King, perceiving the preparations, cried "Halt!" and stepped in just as it was about to pass beneath the arch. The band played the English National Anthem, and the choir sang the verses composed in honour of the Princess of Wales; but the crowd had no patience to wait for this before they burst into enthusiastic cheering for her Royal Highness, for the King and Queen, for the Prince of Wales their son-in-law, and for all the Royal family—all sharing alike in the honours descended on the carriage. The Queen of Denmark, who sat beside the Princess of Wales, acknowledged very graciously the share of compliments intended for her, but looked equally gratified at those addressed to her daughter. The King of Denmark, expressing himself with great distinctness and animation of manner, said "he wished to thank them all for receiving his daughter with the same affectionate heartiness shown on the occasion of her marriage to be married. This proved that their sentiments towards her had never changed. On her part, he could assure them that in all the trials the nation had undergone her heart was one with theirs; it had felt for and with all their sorrows. More than that, the Prince her husband shared her feelings." A final cheer rose on this announcement, and to the music of a King Christian the carriage passed within the gates. It was followed by the general throng until the rise on the Princess's bonnet had disappeared from view, so that "baby" was on the point of being introduced. Clad in blue and white, and held up so that he could be seen by everyone, the little fellow looked equitably serene at the receptions, after all, were every-day affairs, and, since a good many might be looked for in a short space of time, it was well to take things quietly. The Crown Prince of Denmark followed, leading his own carriage, in which the Princess Dagmar sat beside him. The other children of the Danish Royal family succeeded, with the Countess De Grey and Countess Reventlow, and finally some other members of the suite. It would not have been surprising had the gates of the castle been closed as soon as the last of the vehicles entered; but the crowd was allowed to pass in, to walk up the drive, and to take up positions in front of the palace, from which they stared at anyone who happened to approach the windows.

Our larger Engraving represents the Danish Fleet, as it appeared when drawn up off the village of Humblebeck, on the occasion of the Prince's visit to the Sea-shore. The Royal yacht Osborne is proceeding through the lines of the Danish ships of war, which are firing a Royal salute. The Danneborg ironclad will be at once distinguished, as the extreme left of this view. It bears the Admiral's pennant; and the Osborne, with the Royal standards of England and Denmark, is seen in the left hand of the Prince. The following was the programme of the concert :—

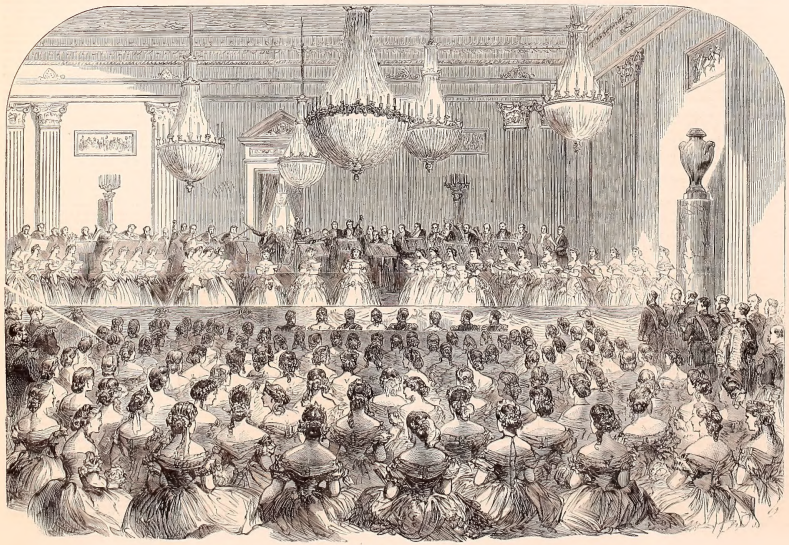
1. Covertoure til "Riverhat," for Orchester.
2. Agnete og Hafmanden, Ballade for Sang og Orchester.
3. (a). Dandevise, for 4 Mandestemmer med Orchester; (b). Valhalla Marsch, for Orchester.

II.



DANSK SANGE.

1. Folkesang; tilsatte af A. P. Berggreen; (c). En Sømandssang (b). Riberhuus Laugsang.
2. Tycho Brahe's Prøvel, Romance.
3. Remineer of C. Hansen; (c). Winther. (c) Mendelssohn-Bartholdy; (d) Romance af "Hjortens Flugt."
4. Eden Hymne.
5. Ved Gjensynet. Sang for Solo og Chor.
6. Ved-Ouverture; (b). Marsch for Orchester.
10. Aftenes Vuggesang (Cherubim), for Chor og Orchester.
11. Nydyrsjægerens Morgensang (Weber), for Chor og Orchester.



The principal singers were Frn Zinck, d'Hr. Hansen, Myrup, Forsker, Austin, and Berggreen, the conductor Herr Rosenwinge. They were mostly from the King's Chapel. The utmost care was of course taken with all the music, and perhaps, on this very account, as well as from the absence of any demonstration of approval by the audience, it was somewhat wanting in warmth. A short break was made after the first piece, when the guests strolled through the connecting suite of apartments, admired a famous Sevres vase in the Blue Room—one of a pair the cost of which was 1,000*l*.—and partook of the various panelling of an oval chamber with carvings of white wood in a chaste and tasteful manner, and their way to the concert-chamber of the suite, in which, screened from the full glare of light, is the bed—a small and plain as that which is given to any visitor to a Copenhagen hotel—in which the Prince of Wales slept. After Mendelsohn's "Wedding March" had brought the concert to a close, the guests were marshalled to the Rittersaal, a hall of commodious size, but by 1860 twinkling wax tapers, some in pendent chandeliers, others in groups of three and four, and others in the embrasures of white sashes, above the coping of the noble gallery; round this gallery was an immense frieze by the Danish sculptor Bissen. Huge knees of timber were they seen, at the base of the walls of the attic, arc the gratings through which warmth is communicated to the magnificent chamber. The supper-table was spread in the form of a horse-shoe with panels of deep red and gold. Beyond this room was another, contrasting with it by the lightness of its decoration—a delicate grey with white panelling and carved sculpture in it. In this came the Pompeian Room, which, in accordance with the system of decoration in the rest of the castle, has the darkest dado, the warmest red tone above, and the yellow highest of all. The supper tables in the Rittersaal were arranged in the same style and order as that the King and Queen, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the other members of the Court mingled freely with the company who thronged this grand chamber. The Queen of Denmark and Princess of the Elephant was worn by the King, the Prince of Wales, Prince Carl, and the Crown Prince over their uniforms. The Prince of Wales was habited in the uniform of a Colonel of Russians.

The townspeople of Copenhagen were provided with a sight of his Royal Highness walking through their streets on Sunday week, on his way from the chapel of the British Embassy, where he had attended Divine service, to the Hôtel Phœnix, whence he proceeded back to Bernstorf. He walked arm-in-arm with Sir Augustus Paget, accompanied by Count Adelsward and Colonel Keppel, and, as it was raining smartly, the gentlemen had to use their umbrellas, as shown in our Sketch, which was taken as they crossed the Kongens Nytorf square. Upon reaching the door of the Hôtel Phœnix he was greeted by a crowd of people who had followed his footsteps with the heartiest cheers. His Royal Highness bowed repeatedly, and then left his hotel

THE SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS.

The National Association for the Promotion of Social Science began its eighth annual session at York on Thursday week, and ended on the following day.

The business of the congress was preceded by service in the cathedral, when an eloquent and appropriate sermon was preached by the Archbishop of York, from Psalm civ., 24—"Lord, how manifold are Thy works: in wisdom hast Thou made them all: the earth is full of Thy riches."

At five o'clock the council met at the Guildhall.

LORD BROUGHAM'S OPENING ADDRESS.

At eight o'clock a general meeting of the members and the associates was held in the Festival Concert-room to hear the introductory address of Lord Brougham, the president. Among those on the platform were the Lord Mayor of York and the Lady Mayoress, Earl Cathcart, Lord Teignmouth; Sir C. Hastings, M.D.; Dr. Lankester, Mr. Westhead, M.P., and several others. Lord Brougham was very cordially received, and on rising to begin his address was greeted with several rounds of applause. The reading of his pamphlet he remarked he had, and continued his address sitting.

In the course of his address Lord Brougham said:—"I should once more preside over our congress, after so often filling the office, is a matter of some regret, considering the many younger and more active men there were in time ordered; and my own resolution had been taken to refuse the honour. But when it was represented to me that my declining would be attributed to the great county strongly desired it, my choice was left but to submit. Of the honours and distinctions with which, in the course of a long life, the very highest must ever be reckoned my election to represent Yorkshire, the last that it was fated to choose myself, was the most welcome. For the duties of the three still live those of my colleague in office who know how bitter was the pang of eschewing that proud position. Those duties are, to take a review how reluctantly the step was taken, how firm the determination of refusal, and to what urgent remonstrance and unbounded kindness only could have yielded the sense of former years, the pleasure naturally arising to vanity damped by the blank—the dismal blank—that must follow the retirement from the cold world. Let me avoid this retrospect, too painful to bear, by at once plunging into the affairs of the hour.

"We are met on the very threshold of our eighth assembly by the most salient, otherwise before neglected, of our topics. It has been done since our last congress. Need I again explain the grounds of this most important omission—the failure which it involves? To say nothing of the absolutely vital all importance of wants to be safe must be gradual, experience being the only safe guide, and the only sure test of the value of remedies, I will briefly reiterate the propriety of not only not only from our labours the first year of our existence, but for many years after dwelling on that more rapid rate, as they who have along the side of the more slowly and methodically advancing, and when they see the vessel borne down the stream in any, sometimes believe it stationary, or borne backwards.

"A most important measure has lately been adopted, at the instance of our council, with regard to the education of the poor. I refer to the step of taking this important subject into their consideration, appointed a deputation to wait on the Minister, and it has been announced to us that a member of the commission shall forthwith be named on the whole subject of middle-class education in compliance with the recommendation of the deputation.

"An important discussion took place in April on the admission of girls to the University local examinations. The arguments against it seem to me the most desirable, and the committee formed for promoting this object are very desirous that it should be brought under the notice of the Royal Commission to the commission for inquiry. There can be no doubt that it will. The object is to have those examinations opened to girls, and the importance of these to persons who desire to follow the line of governesses and schoolmistresses is manifest; and it was stated at the meeting that there was not one worthy colleague, Mr. Hayes, chairman of the Society of Arts, the other Court of Arts, those who, besides the great universities, and the two society and obtained first-class certificates, had been able at once to obtain situations as housekeepers in large public establishments, and to fill them with their way up through different degrees of domestic service. At a time when great exertions are making by military authorities to improve the cookery of the soldier, but it has been reserved for the private enterprise of female employment, surely this discussion in the association has been most opportune.

His Lordship referred to the Post Office savings banks, to private bill registration, to the treatment of convicts, to the Contagious Diseases Act, to co-operative societies, and to other topics.

The noble Lord then made a rapid digression to foreign affairs. He was extremely severe on what he termed the "profligate aggression" of Prussia, allied to Austria, on Denmark.

Referring to the present condition of America, his Lordship said:—"What a sense of misery and of crime does the recent history of the United States of America present to the friends of social science, more horrid than are ever known in modern—let us say Christian—countries! Not only the fact itself, that the whole people, instead of merely permitting, as in other cases, the crimes of their rulers, are themselves the active agents in the worst of the work of merciless slaughter—of such wholesale bloodshed as never before displayed the name of man. Some people have been led to think, and to argue, that slavery is the cause of the war, duped by the pretext that the North fight, to free the slave; whereas their conscientious object is to put down the slave measure, and as afterthought; the (as Bishop Wilberforce says) caring no more for the freedom of the slave than for the life or death of the white. But it has been reserved for the latter act of the tragedy to see that Government, when destitute of other resources, and in the last desperate

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The second day of the Richmond meeting produced a fine race among the youngsters for the Wright Stakes, of which Voltigeur, Roby, Hospodar, Mangarisse, Gildermire, Zeland, Saragossa, Ignominus, Ellerdale, and Fandango have nearly all been winners in their day; but the betting exactly indicated the result, which was by half a length in favour of Oppressor, who gave Oilmar 5 lb. Mr. Jackson's 620-guinea Jupiter was fourth. At the Breconshire meeting the Duke of Beaufort was one of the six leading men by a head with Black Rock and Todlehen, and lost another with Under Bay a short neck. Uproar was in the vein when he met Belsouin, the winner of the Breconshire Stakes; and Mr. Tom Parr, who has not been very often seen in the saddle since old Chelwyder's day, was quite overcome by half a mile from the 3 lb. Glendoick for the Stewards' Cup. The Monmouth meeting maintained the good old style with its handsome country stewards and four-in-hands. This beautiful little course is nearly surrounded by the Wye and the Monnow, and it stands in a magnificent old wooded hills. Thirty-four horses were in attendance, including Black Rock and three more of the Duke's, whose trainer, John Day, won the Beaufort Cup with Tredhill, and another with Lady Ida by Grace for second money in the Monmouthshire Stakes. Four out or twelve horses were down in a heap at one of the awkward turns at Hendon, and one rider was carried away—with a handkerchief over his face, and apparently very severely injured—by the police on a stretcher. The attendance on the Stand and at the balls was good, and, as compared with Perth last year, sport throve at the Caledonian Hunt Meeting at Ayr. Unfortunately, the two principal events for the club who keep racehorses don't send them, and as the dangerous yellow jacket of Mr. Merry was again absent, the quality of the running horses would bear very little comparison with the old General Chassé, Inheritrix, and Modesty days. St. Alexis, a son of Stockwell and Mendicant, and a very good 130-guinea purchase last year previous of Mr. Masterman's, won three races, and only succumbed after a dead heat for the fourth mile, when giving five pounds to Ad. Brown. The Caledonian Cup of one hundred sovs. was carried off, to the great delight of the Dumfries-shire men, by Blood Red Saxon, and Pocahontas by her worthy little huntsman, Joe Graham, whose racing energies have hitherto been principally devoted to leather-plating at Lockerby and elsewhere. The horse was a present from his breeder, Mr. Robert Johnstone, his secretary of the hunt, and it required a good deal of time and patience to get him doctored up and fit. He won at Carlisle, and also showed a most magnificent disregard of posts when he suddenly declined to try on the following day. However, greatness has been thrust upon him at last, and we hope to hear of him for some years yet—racing in summer, and in great things from Castle Milk or the Duke's course during the hunting season.

The Newmarket meeting has had such delightful weather that small rules have been quite a temptation on the Heath. It is observed that the Ring were somewhat justified in holding Zambesi's Derby chance so cheap after the Champagne as he gave Gardevisure 2lb. and beat her by half a neck for the Hopeful. So you see Mr. Payne has been got about the winner, whose running as well as the looks of his yearling stock at Neasham will bear. Mr. Watson's big and powerful son of the Great Eastern Railway Handicap of £500 net was a very close finish between four—and ended in favour of Gemma, who was re-purchased by Lord Stamford for 750 gs. at his sale in December. Gowsman, who was described on the same occasion as being "as tall as the late Mr. Caven Wilson," won a Maiden Plate, and was bought by Lord Derby for £20 more. The St. Leger Stakes brought back old times, as Norman own'd for Lord Exeter and Jardine for Mr. Pocklington, and as he had done the great stake on her half-brother Stockwell twelve years before. The A. F. seems to suit Ely to a nicety, seeing that he beat Tomtom, who ran him to a head for the same race last year, as decisively as he did Bargagh, whose St. Leger apologists declare that a little rain thrown up and into the nose at starting, or the start itself, of a tempest of rain, will make him nervous. Ely does not seem to care for much more than a walk over a course, and the Derby and St. Leger he "cracked" below the distance, and finished fifth.

It is said that 3000 gs. have been refused for Wild Agnes, and that 3500 gs. has been offered for Blair Athol by the Government. The chestnut has only two engagements, which, if he wins them, would be under a thousand guineas apiece—for the "co-partnership" running of this year, Fille de l'Air beat Vermouth easily at 3 lb. on Saturday. The Brighton Race Committee intend to give £400 next year for a piece of plate, in silver or gilt, and invite "silversmiths, sculptors, and other artists" to send designs.

The Doncaster sales this year have been a failure, of which £22,112 must be credited to Messrs. Tattersall. Sixteen brood mares, ever foals, one foaled, fourteen and 102 yearlings were passed over to the hammer, and the whole 134 averaged a trifle under 202 gs. The yearling average was about 219 gs.; Lambton headed the list with a 700-guinea son, Stockwell coming second, with 90 gs. behind. The highest priced six, of which the lowest made 600 gs., averaged 840 gs. So less than two dozen made 500 gs. and upwards. Of the 102 which were withdrawn and sold privately, and those few which were sold without entering the ring at all, quite as much if not more total to not far short of £35,000 for the week. Sprig of Nobility, the winner of the Royal prize in the four-year-old hunter class at Newcastle, and the conqueror of Belphœbe in a match addressed a mock letter to a cotemporary, stating that he is not a mere show-horse, but carries the country gentleman through Middlesboro', has been sold for 250 gs. The late Duke of Cleveland's horses, including Sedbury, The Whiffler, King Arthur, and Priestess (dam of Dulcibella), will be put up at Newmarket during the Cesarewitch week. Bargagh has also retired from the turf and, like Surplice and Zoyler Zee, he is in the market. Bishop Bonner's late brother (by Bataplan) has been named "Blinkhoolie."

The running season has commenced at Audley and Whitehaven, but the Scottish National Club has been put back for two months to Nov. 8. A dull cricket season, in which the Elevens have only once met, and then without the Australian team, is waiting for its close; but it will be always remembered for the deeds of Jupp and T. Humphrey. Notes are to be pleasantly exchanged between the Duke of Beaufort's and Sir Watkin Wynne's hounds have had some excellent sailing, and we hear that a party is going out shortly to Italy, and that Joe Hogg, once huntsman to Earl Wemyss, and latterly to a pack in the west, has been engaged to hunt them.

A six-swimming-race took place on Bunday on the Thames, between Hammersmith and Putney, for a silver cup, value £20. There were twelve competitors, and the winner was the youngest swimmer of all—David Pamplin, not sixteen years of age.

MUSIC.

The promenade concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre and Covent Garden continue to go on with undiminished success, and have no small effect in enlivening the town at this dead season. At both places there have been fresh attractions this week: at Her Majesty's Theatre the Danish performers, brought from Copenhagen; and at Covent Garden Signor Bottesini with another double-bass. The Danish performers consist of a military band of brass instruments and a party of singers, four in number. The instrumental band is admirable, and the vocalists sing the national melodies of their country with delightful simplicity and spirit. Signor Bottesini has reappeared after an absence of several years, and his performances are more astonishing and more beautiful than ever. He may well be called the Paganini of the double-bass. The audience on Monday had a gigantic instrument every effect which his great predecessor achieved on his violin, and the enthusiasm was equally loud, the performances of the one house, and Bottesini at the other, have been welcomed with enthusiasm.

The Royal English Opera Company are to begin their first season at Covent Garden on Saturday, the 15th inst., with an English version of "Masaniello," and this opera, it is announced, will be performed alternately with Flotow's "Martha." Planquette's opera "Helvellyn," the libretto by Oxenford and the music by Macfarren, will be the first novelty, and new operas by Battue, Benedict, Leslie, Gounod, Clay, and Felicien David have been accepted. The conductors will be Mr. Alfred Mellon, Sherrington, Aylward, and Mr. Mdme. Weiss, Miss Poole, Miss Martorelli, Mrs. Aynsley Cooke, Mrs. Illingworth, Mdme. Parepa, Mr. Charles Adams (from Berlin), Mr. Haigh, Mr. Frewin, Mr. Patey, Mr. Santley, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Aynsley Cooke, Mr. Augustus Harris (a stage manager); Mr. Smythson, chorus master; Messrs. Jarrett and Pennyman, agents; Mr. Mellon, musical director and conductor of the orchestra. All this promises well, and we heartily wish success to the undertaking. There are many rocks ahead, but we trust they will be avoided by wary management.

The annual concert of the 5000 voices of the metropolitan schools took place last Saturday, at the Crystal Palace, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin. The first part, which consisted of sacred music, comprised a simply beautiful chorale composed by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, which recently was performed at Windsor, and was encored. The band of the Duke of York's school played during the display of gymnastic exercises, and Mr. Martin led a chorus by a performance by Mr. J. G. Bowdman on the great organ.

Master Willie Pape, a boy of ten years, on Wednesday yesterday week, which was numerously and fashionably attended. He was honoured by the presence of the Duchess of Cambridge. This week he gives recitals at Doncaster and Clifton.

THE THEATRES.

The prospects of the coming theatrical season continue to improve. Great satisfaction was given to the public on Saturday by the reopening of the Lyceum Theatre, which commences with a repetition of those of last season, and simply intended as introductory to the novelties of the present, no description of them is necessary. It will be sufficient to say that the company remains intact. The representation of King Henry IV. by Mr. Marston was classical and striking, and that of Hotspur was admirable. Mr. Marston's personality is conception and effective in execution. Mr. Phelps's dry performance of Falstaff is eminently satisfactory.

Another house which opens at the EAST-End the repertation of another Drury, we mean the Great National Standard Theatre, under the auspices of Mr. Shepherd. Denmark Hill has also opened in an enlarged and redecorated state, on Saturday. The most material alterations have been made in the auditorium, the front of the house having been thrown into the entrance hall, which is tastefully furnished with hand-some chairs. The entrances, also, have been changed, so that now the boxes are approached by a handsome flight of steps, a grand marble staircase, profusely illuminated. A new and picturesque proscenium, and a large magnificent curtain of crimson velvet, make the stage look remarkably attractive. The new play was produced on the occasion by Mr. J. T. Douglass, and placed on the stage with full appointments and many scenic effects. It is entitled "Jessie Brown," and consists of three acts and an episode. The story is this:—Dan Mcquid of Dunoon, a Highland soldier, has a daughter born to him as an infant daughter, who was exposed on the Princess to perish, but was providentially saved by some peasants. He is also jealous of his wife, Donna Juan, a Spanish lady, who, in fact, is not. He is told so by intriguers, with one Edward Cleveland, an English physician, whom he suspects of being his wife's lover. Donna Juan is a very fine Spanish lass woman, but the doctor is innocent of the charge. Agila, likewise, is told by the intriguers that he is enamoured of Jessie Mcquid's daughter. Ultimately, Jessie is recovered and restored to her father, and then the malignant mother-in-law seeks to compass her destruction by means of an infernal machine—a pistol—but the plot is foiled, and the machine explodes. The episode is a good-humoured lawyer's clerk, played by Mr. Britain Wright with infinite humour. Agila is found to be a man with his own weapon, and perishes miserably. The piece throughout was applauded. Miss Minnie Davis, as Jane, was interesting. Miss Marion Jackson, in one of the Donna Juan's, was very effective, and on the whole, was over-weighted. The denouement requires more powers than she possesses, and the part ought to be transferred to someone on the house as it would have done if the scene had been adequately acted. The picturesque character of the piece and its interesting story, however, will secure its popularity.

On Wednesday a new two-act play was produced at the Strand by Mr. W. T. Moncrieff, called "Sweethearts and Wives," in which the "Milky White" will prove a formidable rival to his "Poor Boy." Mr. Craven himself performed the principal character, after which the drama is named; and he is a country gentleman, living on his own estate, being that of a simple countryman—a cowboy, in fact—in the style of Adam Trueman. The character individual is a fine, manly, sailor man, remarkably droll and remarkably litigious. He bring actions against all his neighbours for trivial matters, and, assisted by a young veterinary surgeon, his daughter's lover, undertakes his cure, and effects it; and the first thing he overhears is his daughter expressing to the doctor her love for him, and the doctor's manly reply to her avowal, that she may secure the £4000 contingent on his decease. As he has effected a cure in the case of the bullock, he undertakes to himself and, rising in an anger which is fearfully tragic, tears out of doors the young surgeon, the boy, and his daughter. The acting in this situation was wonderfully energetic. The second act shows us Milky White attempting to starve himself in bed, when he is visited by his next-door neighbour, a widow whom he had unflagrantly oppressed, but who reposes heartiness with kindness, and who, in the end, is rewarded by the old man's hand for a printed form of a will and fills it up in her favour. The humour throughout is of the most unexceptionable character, and about a reconciliation. Slowly, but surely, the true state of matters is explained to the once deaf man, and he learns that the four thousand pounds relative to a reversionary interest has been paid purchased, and that he is his daughter's lover, and not the cowboy. The piece is full of humour, and the whole of the scenes are finely witnessed, and is worth a thousand sensation pieces. The dialogue is strong and natural, and the whole is admirably acted, and the piece is fully up to the mark. The success of the new drama is indisputable. Throughout and at the conclusion it commands the greatest applause, and will prove an inevitable attraction.

The Haymarket has quietly reopened with the old comic opera of "The Castle of Andalusia," and Mr. Buckstone affords much amusement in the part of Sparks. The Olympic has been leased to Mr. Horace Wigan for a term of years, and will shortly reopen under his management. Sedley's Wells, under the direction of Miss Marriott, continues to produce the Shakspearean drama. "Romeo and Juliet" and "Macbeth" have both been acted with success. Mr. Melville is gradually making way with the Islington audience, and, we have no doubt, will succeed in establishing a permanent reputation.

It is understood that Lord Lyons, the British Ambassador at Washington, will shortly pay another visit to Canada.

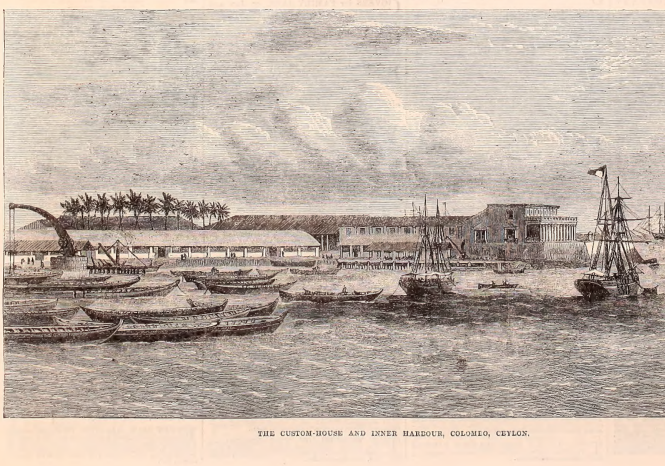
THE NEW ASSIZE COURTS AT MANCHESTER.

THE NEW ASSIZE COURTS AT MANCHESTER.



We publish a View of the front and one of the interior of the great hall of that noble building which has lately been erected in the Cheetham Hill-road, Manchester, for the Assize business of the Salford Hundred and neighbouring districts of Lancashire. For many years past the Judges of the Northern Circuit had held the South Lancashire Assizes only in St. George's Hall, at Liverpool; and the large populations of Manchester, Salford, Bolton, Bury, Rochdale, and other great manufacturing towns in that part of the country were put to much inconvenience by having to resort to Liverpool for the trial of all important civil and criminal cases. The magistrates of the Hundred of Salford, having obtained from Government the concession of a separate Assize, to be held at Manchester, undertook to provide a suitable Palace of Justice. Their liberality and public spirit, with the abilities of Mr. A. Waterhouse, of New-street, Spring-gardens, the architect whom they employed, have produced what is, beyond all comparison, the finest structure ever raised in England for a similar purpose. An eminent critic has recently declared that "this building — the great work of Northern England — will mark an epoch in the history of the architecture of our age, proving, as it does — more completely than the houses of Parliament, because designed at a time of riper experience and in a purer style—that modern administrative uses and mediæval architecture fit well together." We shall not attempt a description of the design, which, as observed by the same writer, "may well claim to stand in competition with the noblest townhalls of the Low Countries and of Germany." The vast and picturesque exterior might have concealed a crowded, ill-arranged interior. It so happens that the inside is symmetrically and conveniently laid out, the stone staircases wide and easy, the corridors roomy, the windows broad and cheerful, the chambers high, the two principal court-rooms spacious and ornate, and the salle des pas perdus a noble apartment, as shown in our second Illustration. The style of architecture is florid Venetian Gothic, and the interior of each court is in admirable keeping with it. The fittings are of oak, and light and elegant panelled oak surrounds the courts, being well calculated for sound, and giving to each court an air of elegance and comfort. The ornamentation of the courts is by Mr. Crace, of London; it harmonises with the designs of the architect, and everything is genuine, substantial, and elegant. There is no tawdriness of painting and stucco and imitation marble; carved oak and varnished pinewood, and the carved greystone of the building, are almost the only ornaments used. Connected with the courts is a magnificent hall, with tesselated pavement to promenade in—the salle des pas perdus of which we have spoken. It is covered with a hammer-beam roof of open timber-work, the spaces between the rafters being painted blue and powdered with white stars. Grotesque figures on each side support the gas pendants, which, of their kind, are very light and elegant—by Skidmore, of Coventry. It is lighted at each end by two large stained-glass tracery windows. A light and elegant arched corridor, with abundance of light from a stained-glass roof, leads to a most charming library, fitted with little recesses, in which the members of the Bar may quietly read their briefs apart from the rest of the room. On the opposite side of the hall a wide stone staircase, the sides lined with encaustic tiles in a pleasing and quiet pattern, which, in fact, goes round the interior of the building, leads to a suite of consultation-rooms, to a very well proportioned and exceedingly handsome barristers' dining-room for the Bar mess, plainly yet handsomely furnished with a long oak table and cross table capable of dining about one hundred barristers. The room is furnished with strong substantial, leather-seated oak chairs, the ornaments and other furniture being in excellent taste and perfect keeping. In the basement story are the kitchen and other offices, fitted for a large household, and admirably contrived. At the other end of the building are the private apartments of the Judges and their marshals and suite. They are all furnished with a plain, substantial, and yet elegant, taste. One thing is particularly observable throughout the building—the perfect adaptability of its various parts to the purposes to which they are applied. There are no dark holes, or gloomy gallit passages, or badly-contrived closets. Mr. Waterhouse has satisfactorily solved the problem of lighting a Gothic passage by skylights. His expedient is very simple—that of spanning the corridor with a series of acutely-pointed stone arches, so as to break up the extent of top glass, and frame it between the successive arches. There is an abundance of light, of ventilation, and of convenience of every kind. The Gothic form of the building seems to have adapted itself to exactly what was wanted within, and the lofty and elegant timber-arched roofs afford that variety of form and of beauty which at once satisfies and gratifies the eye.

THE ENTRANCE HALL OF THE NEW ASSIZE COURTS AT MANCHESTER.

THE CUSTOM-HOUSE AND INNER HARBOUR, COLOMBO.

We lately gave a View of the lighthouse, battery, and flagstaff which overlook one part of the harbour of Colombo. The Custom-house and Inner Harbour are shown in our present Illustration, which is, like the former one, engraved from a photograph by Messrs. Slinn and Co. of that town. The European capital of Ceylon is not, indeed, a place of much maritime traffic, its port affording shelter to none but light native vessels, while the larger ships which anchor in the offing are exposed to disasters from the violence of the monsoons. It was to the vicinity of the cinnamon-gardens that Colombo owed its selection by the Portuguese in the sixteenth century, and by the Dutch, whose Government was there established at a later date. Coffee, which has now become a more considerable article of Ceylon produce than cinnamon, finds its way to Galle or Trincomalee, and those towns will henceforth supersede Colombo, both in commercial and political importance.
